Purpose of Report: For Decision

Prepared by Public Affairs
PROPOSAL FOR A NEW LAW SOCIETY APPROACH TO ACCESS TO JUSTICE

Motion

1. That Convocation approve the creation of a framework to facilitate the reinforcement and integration of access to justice objectives, including intersecting equity principles, into the core business, functions and operational planning of the Law Society, the key components of which are as follows, and as further described in this report:

   a. An internal focus on access to justice, including equity principles, as a strategic objective underpinning the Law Society’s work, which will include:
      i. aligning resources to enhance the Law Society’s approach to developing access to justice objectives integrated across program areas; and
      ii. strategically reviewing, reconsidering and, where appropriate, amending the Law Society’s rules, regulations, policies and practices to foster change and innovation and achieve the Law Society’s access to justice objectives.

   b. An external focus through which the Law Society will facilitate a standing forum for collaboration on access to justice by:
      i. reconstituting the Treasurer’s Advisory Group on Access to Justice as a standing forum called The Action Group on Access to Justice; and
      ii. providing administrative and other resources necessary to assist in convening and supporting the ongoing functioning of the standing forum.

   c. The development of appropriate metrics to measure the effectiveness of steps and actions taken by the Law Society.

   d. In addition to periodic updates, an evaluation and report to Convocation within three years on achievements, challenges and improvements pertaining to the development and implementation of the access to justice framework.
INTRODUCTION

2. There are major access to justice gaps in this country. The National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters and others have highlighted:
   a. As many as one in three people will experience at least one legal problem in a given three year period. Few will have the resources to solve them.
   b. Members of poor and vulnerable groups are particularly prone to legal problems. They experience more legal problems than higher income earners and more secure groups.
   c. The problems people have often multiply; that is, having one kind of legal problem can often lead to other legal, social and health related problems.
   d. Legal problems have social and economic costs. Unresolved legal problems adversely affect people’s lives and the public purse.

3. As the Honourable Frank Iacobucci noted in his recently released report on First Nations Representation on Ontario Juries (Tab 2.1) the justice system generally as applied to First Nations peoples, particularly in the North, is in crisis. He notes a set of broad and systemic issues at the heart of the current dysfunctional relationship between Ontario’s justice system and Aboriginal peoples in this province.

4. The current justice system, which is inaccessible to so many, disproportionately impacts members of immigrant, Aboriginal and rural and northern populations, and other vulnerable groups. It is unable to respond adequately to the problem and is unsustainable.

5. In addition, the legal professions themselves are facing significant change as they endeavour to remain viable, competitive and relevant in the face of challenges presented by globalization, technology and changing client demands (see most recently the CBA’s Legal Futures Initiative). Not least of the challenges facing the profession is access to justice and a perception that the legal profession is out of touch, not representative of the populations it serves, and itself creates barriers to low and middle income Ontarians accessing legal services and justice.
6. In the face of this growing understanding of the challenges, the legal professions are urged to redefine professionalism and ensure a strong focus on serving the public. In this context, the Law Society has an opportunity to profoundly influence change and respond, within the scope of its authority, to the challenges people are facing in accessing justice in this province.

7. This report from the Treasurer’ Advisory Group on Access to Justice (TAG) Working Group proposes a framework for change that would see the Law Society lead and innovate on these important issues.

8. The proposals in this report have been revised since first presented to Convocation for information and discussion on January 23, 2014. The proposals have benefitted from significant input and advice from a range of committees, individual benchers, and Law Society advisory groups such as the Treasurer’s Liaison Group, the Equity Advisory Group, and the Aboriginal Working Group. Discussions have also occurred with other stakeholder groups and associations and numerous written submissions have been received commenting on the proposals. In response to this significant input received, the proposals have been clarified, refined, and amended.

BACKGROUND

9. The Law Society has been engaged with issues pertaining to access to justice for years: from the work of the standing Committee on Access to Justice, to the regulation of paralegals introduced in 2007. In fact, the Law Society’s mandate was enhanced with the legislative amendments introducing paralegal regulation to include a specific duty with regard to access to justice:

Principles to be applied by the Society

4.2 In carrying out its functions, duties and powers under this Act, the Society shall have regard to the following principles:

2. The Society has a duty to act so as to facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario. 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 7.

10. Law societies across the country have been engaged in a number of diverse initiatives aimed at improving public access to legal services, ranging from those designed to prevent legal problems from arising, to those aimed at expanding knowledge and services for the self-represented, to those that increase access to legal assistance. There is growing recognition, however, of the limitations of these one-off, ad hoc approaches.

11. Despite significant individual and organizational efforts, including those of the law societies, the “crisis” only seems to be growing, highlighted perhaps most starkly by the numbers of self-represented litigants appearing in courts across the country. As a result, the attention being focussed on the need to address the imperative to provide more effective and meaningful access to justice in the last few years has been unprecedented.

12. The Law Society has responsibility for a broad range of regulatory activities, including standard setting, rule making, policy development and implementation, licensing, investigation and prosecution of complaints against lawyers and paralegals, adjudication of conduct, competence and capacity matters and imposition and monitoring of penalties. Across this range of activities there is significant scope to influence a cultural shift, foster innovation, and stimulate change that will better “facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario.”

13. In response to growing pressures and to further explore opportunities for the Law Society to enhance its role and provide leadership on these issues, the Treasurer identified access to justice as a priority during his term as Treasurer. In January 2013 he met with the Chairs of the Access to Justice, Government Relations, and Equity and Aboriginal Issues Committees. The Chairs were overwhelmingly supportive of seeking an enhanced role for the Law Society on these issues and agreed that focussed consultations within the profession and stakeholder groups would help to inform what that role should or could be.
14. Accordingly, the Treasurer’s Advisory Group on Access to Justice (TAG) was established to seek information and advice from a broad cross-section of those involved in the justice sector: organizations whose core mandate involves addressing access to justice, lawyer and paralegal associations, representatives of groups promoting equity and diversity in the legal professions, courts and government representatives, and academics (list of the groups and organizations who have participated in TAG meetings attached as Tab 2.2).

15. Although established for a specific and limited purpose, TAG has already had the effect of facilitating a broader collaborative dialogue and galvanizing interest and energy. Posts to the Treasurer’s Blog over the past year, as well as regular updates provided to Convocation and press coverage and attention, have helped to keep the profession informed about the Law Society’s activities and evolving plans in regard to a new approach to access to justice issues.

TAG - What the Law Society Has Heard

16. Numerous meetings of TAG participants have occurred, both formally and informally, over the past year. Those dialogues culminated in a symposium in October 2013: Creating a Climate for Change. A group of key leaders and decision-makers dedicated to improving access to justice gathered for concrete and practical discussions about structures and mechanisms for implementing change, particularly as related to an enhanced role for the Law Society on these issues as it fulfils its legislative mandate.

17. Two background papers were prepared for the symposium: one to highlight key themes emerging from the many reports and recommendations of the last several years; and one to provide an overview of the scope of activities and organizations focused on improving access to justice in Ontario (Access to Justice Themes: “Quotable Quotes,” Tab 2.3; Legal Organizations and Access to Justice Activities in Ontario, Tab 2.4). The final report from the symposium summarizes the nature of input and ideas the Law Society received about an appropriate role (Creating a Climate for Change: Report from the TAG Symposium, October 29, 2013, Tab 2.5).
18. The core of the advice and input received through the TAG dialogues and symposium has been remarkably consistent and includes:

a. Meaningful change will require changing the discourse – finding a common voice; engaging the public; creating a political climate for change.

b. “Putting people first” requires an understanding that barriers to access to justice are both the cause and the effect of the disadvantages experienced today by various communities in Ontario society;

c. In changing the discourse, the Law Society is well positioned to act as a catalyst/facilitator/educator:
   i. Providing a forum for dialogue and collaboration – bringing diverse actors together and enabling “those in charge” to work together;
   ii. Exploring and developing mechanisms to ensure broader public awareness: of the services available and how to access them; and of the importance of access to justice for all Ontarians more generally.

d. Change – focussed, systemic and sustained - is necessary across the justice sector and across disciplinary boundaries; as an agent of change, the Law Society can lead and foster innovation within its own regulatory context by, for instance:
   i. addressing any regulatory impediments to, or creating inducements for, innovation generally in the delivery of legal services;
   ii. ensuring regulation of professional competence and conduct is appropriately balanced against the broader public interest in access to justice;
   iii. examining alternative structures that could better facilitate innovative approaches to the provision of legal services;
   iv. providing education and inducement for the professions to be better engaged on the issues and solutions;
   v. considering the scope of paralegal practice;
   vi. reaching out to diverse communities, particularly those where barriers to access to justice have been identified, and sharing and encouraging research on their needs and perspectives;
   vii. considering inducements for rural and other service delivery methods that would help address geographic barriers to access to justice.
19. Collaboration, and mechanisms to facilitate it, were central topics at every TAG meeting over the past year and were emphasized again at the TAG Symposium in October. Participants there strongly encouraged the Law Society to maintain the leadership it has shown in bringing diverse players together. There is now momentum and an expectation created that the Law Society will have an ongoing role in facilitating a collaborative dialogue in Ontario.

Other Initiatives that have Informed the Law Society’s Approach

20. Many reports were reviewed and highlighted for the TAG Symposium. Three national reports released in 2013 were of particular significance in informing and shaping the TAG Working Group’s proposal for a new Law Society approach to access to justice:
   c. The National Self-Represented Litigants Project: Identifying and Meeting the Needs of Self-Represented Litigants, final report, Dr. Julie Macfarlane (May 2013) (Tab 2.8).

21. Each of these reports (and their supporting background papers) has specific recommendations pertaining to law societies and professional regulation. The reports are consistent in the types of innovations they say law societies should be contemplating. As summarized by the Action Committee on Access to Civil and Family Justice in A Roadmap for Change (at page 14):

   “Specific innovations and improvements that should be considered and potentially developed include:

   - Limited scope retainers – “unbundling”;
   - Alternative business and delivery models;
   - Increased opportunities for paralegal services;
• Increased legal information services by lawyers and qualified non-lawyers;
• Appropriate outsourcing of legal services;
• Summary advice and referrals;
• Alternative billing models;
• Legal expense insurance and broad-based legal care;
• Pro bono and low bono services;
• Creative partnerships and initiatives designed to encourage expanding access to legal services – particularly to low income clients;
• Programs to promote justice services to rural and remote communities as well as marginalized and equity seeking communities; and
• Programs that match unmet legal needs with unmet legal markets.”

22. All of these reports also agree that access to justice is a multi-faceted issue that requires responses within and beyond the formal justice system. Most importantly, each report highlights the lack of leadership and collaboration on access to justice issues as being central to the reason that change and improvement continue to be such a challenge. The system’s players are urged to change their focus:

“Within our current constitutional, administrative and sectoral frameworks, much more collaboration and coordination is not only needed but achievable. We can and must improve collaboration and coordination not only across and within jurisdictions, but also across and within all sectors and aspects of the justice system (civil, family, early dispute resolution, courts, tribunals, the Bar, the Bench, court administration, the academy, the public, etc.). We can and must improve collaboration, coordination and service integration with other social service sectors and providers as well.” (NAC, A Roadmap for Change, p. 7)

23. The importance of collaboration is highlighted in each report with specific recommendations for the creation of a collaborative forum, in one form or another, which brings together system players and its users and stimulates action for change.

24. Adopting a collaborative approach was also highlighted in the Law Society of Upper Canada, Legal Aid Ontario and Pro Bono Law Ontario’s joint report Listening to Ontarians (attached at Tab 2.9). It states “We believe that accessibility to the civil justice system would improve if organizations committed to access to justice committed to sharing information and working together” (at page 60).

25. Other significant Ontario reports have also highlighted the importance of collaboration; including the Karen Cohl and George Thomson report Connecting across Language and Distance and the report prepared by The Honourable Paul Rouleau and Paul Le Vay Access to Justice in French. Both reports recommend a coordinated approach for enhancing linguistic and rural access to legal information and services.

26. And, of course, the Honourable Frank Iacobucci’s report on First Nations Representation on Ontario Juries (Tab 2.1) provides a stark and chilling reminder of the particular crisis Ontario’s Aboriginal peoples face in accessing justice, and cannot be ignored. It too speaks of the need for systemic and cooperative action.

27. All of these reports have provided, in effect, a menu of innovations and changes that the Law Society, within it statutory mandate, must embrace, pursue and support. The challenge is to do so in an organized and strategic way, coordinated across program areas of the Law Society, and across partners within and beyond the justice sector who can contribute collectively to systemic and lasting changes.

The Key Role of Equity

28. The Law Society’s ongoing involvement with equity issues through engagement with external groups, consultation with the professions, and reviewing and conducting related research, has also informed the Law Society’s current approach to clarifying and defining its access to justice mandate.

29. In May 1997, the Law Society of Upper Canada unanimously adopted the Bicentennial Report and Recommendations on Equity Issues in the Legal Profession (the “Bicentennial Report”) which forms the foundation to the equity and diversity work of the Law Society.
The Bicentennial Report reviewed the status of women, and members of the Aboriginal, Francophone, racialized, disability, gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender communities in the profession. The Bicentennial Report made sixteen recommendations that have since guided the Law Society as it promotes equality and diversity within the legal profession.

30. The adoption of the Bicentennial Report led to a series of systemic changes to promote equality and diversity within the legal profession and within the Law Society. The changes included the creation of an infrastructure to address these issues, including a standing committee of Convocation, advisory groups and the internal capacity. This in turn has led to the creation of programs such as: public education programs for members of the public and the profession; professional development programs for the profession; the adoption of significant policy initiatives such as the modification of the Rules of Professional Conduct and the Paralegal Rules of Conduct to address harassment and discrimination and the obligation of lawyers and paralegals to offer services in the French language; and significant research and policy development initiatives, such as the Challenges Faced by Racialized Licensees project and the consultations with the Aboriginal bar and lawyers with disabilities. The Aboriginal Bar Consultation Report provided numerous recommendations to support Aboriginal licensees that the Law Society has implemented or is pursuing including: networking, certified specialist designation in Aboriginal Law, and mentoring.

31. It is clear from research and consultations conducted to date that the concept of access to justice must include a consideration of Aboriginal, Francophone and equity-seeking communities. There is now ample evidence that these communities experience disproportionate barriers in the current justice system. At the same time, in the name of access to justice, the legal professions must be representative of the community they serve. As a result, the promotion of equity in the legal professions, and the enhancement of access to justice for Ontarians, must be viewed as complementary and interrelated challenges.

32. There will never be real access to justice without the involvement of legal professions that are inclusive, diverse and representative. Conversely, access to justice will not be attained if members of Aboriginal, Francophone and equity-seeking communities continue to face barriers to access. Within the scope of its authority and mandate, the Law Society must therefore approach the interrelated dimensions of the equity and access to justice issues in a coordinated and simultaneous way.

A NEW LAW SOCIETY APPROACH TO ACCESS TO JUSTICE

33. It is apparent from all of the above that access to justice comprises a broad category of issues and responses that cannot all be addressed at once or by one entity. While not alone in shouldering the responsibility for promoting access to justice, it must be recognized that the Law Society does play and must play a central role in shaping and guiding the legal professions and in influencing change and innovation.

34. In order to be most effective, the Law Society needs a clear and new framework within which these issues and emerging recommendations must be considered. This framework would ensure that access to justice and related equity issues are considered in a strategic, systematic and sustained way, consistent with – and integrated into – the Law Society’s core functions with regard to professional competence and professional conduct.

35. This is not a proposal to supplant those core functions but, rather, to supplement and enhance them, recognizing the growing public interest in and demand for improved access to justice. This is a proposal to break down siloed thinking and approaches, both internally and externally, to enable better integration of efforts and objectives which will “facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario.”

36. Creating a new framework with structural and resource supports within which these issues can be considered allows the Law Society to take the many reports and recommendations that already exist and begin to consider what they mean for the regulator and for system partners more broadly in working collaboratively to achieve meaningful and long lasting change.
37. The TAG Working Group proposes that the details of this new framework, including mechanisms for engagement with the users of the system and other stakeholders in order to identify priorities and processes for change, be developed over the next few months. With Convocation’s approval, the details of the framework would be developed around two key components, one with an internal focus and one – a standing forum – focusing externally.

Key Component – Internal

38. The first key component of the proposed framework would require a critical, holistic and ongoing examination of the Law Society’s own rules, regulations, policies and programs – both existing and proposed – to assess their effectiveness in meeting access to justice objectives. Where access to justice objectives have not already been identified, they should be considered. In identifying access to justice objectives, a particular emphasis should be placed on consideration of how those objectives would benefit those who can be among the most marginalized in society, including Aboriginal peoples, racialized communities, people with disabilities, and other equity-seeking groups.

39. This exercise would be informed to a great extent by the reports and recommendations that have emerged over the last year or so. The framework will ensure that those reports and recommendations are considered in a systematic and coordinated way across program areas. This will include a process and timeline to address, specifically and practically, proposals including those recommended by the Action Committee, Canadian Bar Association, and others such as,

   a. alternative business and delivery models;
   b. increased opportunities for paralegal services;
   c. increased legal information services by lawyers and qualified non-lawyers;
   d. regulation with respect to outsourcing of legal services;
   e. regulation with respect to the provision of summary advice and referrals.
40. In conjunction with the proposed external forum, the framework will also allow for further consideration of other issues and opportunities including those related to the following:
   a. alternative billing models;
   b. legal expense insurance and broad-based legal care;
   c. pro bono and low bono services;
   d. creative partnerships and initiatives designed to encourage expanding access to legal services – particularly to low income clients – including enhancements to legal aid;
   e. programs to promote justice services to rural and remote communities as well as marginalized and Aboriginal, Francophone and equity seeking communities; and
   f. programs that match unmet legal needs with unmet legal markets.

41. Operational changes already implemented by the Chief Executive Officer present an opportunity to align resources to the development and implementation of the proposed framework. The CEO has begun a reorganization of certain program areas to more efficiently and effectively deliver and support the Law Society’s core functions. A new Division – Strategic Policy, Communications and Corporate Relations - has been created with a new Executive Director appointed as of February 3, 2014. This new Division will integrate issues management, access and equity, government and stakeholder relations, strategic communications, and Convocation and Committee support, into a new reporting and operating structure.

42. A core task of the new Division, with guidance from Convocation, will be to develop the details of the proposed framework necessary to fully integrate and implement a new approach to access to justice issues, including through identification of its guiding principles, objectives, work plans and outcomes/deliverables. Performance and outreach measures will be developed to ensure ongoing evaluation of the ability of the new Division to achieve its objectives.
43. The new Division will serve to ensure that a consistent and supported approach is taken across the organization in articulating and meeting access to justice objectives. The Division will position itself to provide expert advice and perspective on access to justice and related equity issues to support the core functions of the Law Society regarding professional competence and conduct. It will continue to liaise with members of Aboriginal, Francophone and equity partners to ensure various perspectives are appropriately considered. In addition, ongoing liaison will occur with the Canadian Bar Association, the Action Committee, and others to continue discussions with regard to the implementation of the recommendations they have made.

44. As more support, focus and structure is brought to the Law Society’s approach to responding to access to justice issues and the recommendations emerging over the last year or so, there will be the ability to more nimbly and effectively respond to opportunities for dialogue and partnerships. The Law Society can be better positioned to develop informed, innovative and lasting change on a systemic basis.

45. As example, establishing this framework and integrating access to justice and equity issues into the Law Society’s core business and operational planning will allow more strategic and coordinated responses between intersecting issues of access to justice and equity such as the challenges faced in obtaining access to justice in French, and by Aboriginal people and members of equity-seeking communities in accessing legal services. All of these issues have highlighted the need to be informed by the system users and to respond collaboratively with system partners. The framework proposed will better position the Law Society to do that in a more informed and coordinated way.

46. Within the new framework, the Law Society will engage with Aboriginal leadership and continue to liaise with the Aboriginal bar on access to justice issues, and will do so better equipped and informed about the role the Law Society has and the scope of its ability to respond to the challenges Aboriginal people face. A more structured framework and approach will enable more effective engagement ensuring that feedback provided to the Law Society can be appropriately considered and applied.
47. Similarly, as the Law Society responds to the Access to Justice in French report, or others, it can do so in a more coordinated, focused and effective way.

48. Committing to and fulfilling this component of the proposed framework also positions the Law Society to better support the second key component, an external forum. By integrating access to justice objectives into its core business and functions, the Law Society can lead by example and maintain the credibility needed to lead and support external partners.

Key Component – External – Standing Forum on Access to Justice

49. The second key component recommended by the TAG Working Group would see the Law Society provide the coordination and infrastructure support necessary to create and sustain a standing forum for collaboration on access to justice. This external forum will help to ensure that the Law Society’s activities are complementary and supportive of the work of other key partners and, importantly, informed by users and service providers most familiar with their issue-specific challenges and opportunities. The Law Society recognizes that broad support of these partners and Ontarians generally is essential to achieving and sustaining meaningful change.

50. This type of cooperation and collaboration has been repeatedly identified as a necessary precursor to practical and long-lasting change. The lack of coordination and collaboration has been identified as a key “implementation gap” or impediment to moving forward with systemic change.

51. This proposal should be seen as a first step in realizing the structures that the Action Committee and Canadian Bar Association have recommended. No other body in Ontario has yet stepped forward to provide the infrastructure necessary to the collaborative forum all have recommended. The Law Society is uniquely positioned to do so and to convene meetings of a broad cross-section of system partners and beyond.
52. The TAG Working Group proposes that TAG be reconstituted to become “The Action Group on Access to Justice”. The types of support proposed to be provided to The Action Group by the Law Society include:
   a. convening and facilitating meetings;
   b. relying on the Law Society’s significant and positive government and stakeholder relations to build and sustain strategic partnerships necessary for success, and to influence change, as appropriate;
   c. providing administrative and related support in the coordination of meetings and tasks flowing therefrom; and
   d. assisting in the collection, analysis and dissemination of information.

53. Here again, the operational changes already underway present an opportunity to offer this support. The newly created Division would liaise with and provide the administrative and outreach support to the ongoing work of The Action Group. This is not anticipated to require new resources but would be accomplished largely through realignment and efficiencies found as the new Division reorganizes staff and functions.

54. The Action Group would seek to secure diverse participation ranging from key leaders in governments, courts, academia, and bar and paralegal associations, as well as representatives of Aboriginal, Francophone and equity partners, legal aid and clinics, and other legal and non-legal organizations and groups who play a role in providing access to justice in the province.

55. It is proposed that The Action Group’s participants would together develop a shared vision and common agenda for change. The various studies, reports and recommendations of the last several years provide a solid foundation from which to quickly achieve that task. The Action Group would also benefit from continued liaison with and advice from members of the Canadian Bar Association’s Reaching Equal Justice Initiative and members of the National Action Committee, including the Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas Cromwell, who have themselves participated in TAG dialogues and provided such detailed and thoughtful advice and support to date.

56. Once developed, the common agenda could, in turn, lead to agreed-upon actions and strategies to be implemented in a complementary and cooperative way by The Action Group’s participants. In this respect, it would be essential that The Action Group’s participants be prepared to pursue the implementation of identified activities that are mutually reinforcing of one another and clearly linked back to the common agenda.

57. The Action Group could meet regularly as a whole and in topic-focused sub-groups. The Action group could also host an annual symposium to serve both as a mechanism to “report out” the work it has undertaken in the previous year, and to build and sustain interest and momentum around a common agenda for the following year.

58. Funding for actions and strategies agreed to by The Action Group’s participants would come from the participants’ usual funding sources. As The Action Group’s participants cooperate and collaborate toward a common agenda and vision, there is opportunity to leverage funding much more effectively and efficiently. This approach will also allow the Law Society to move away from being perceived as a funder of access initiatives. Rather, the Law Society’s contribution would be through its facilitative leadership and infrastructure support to The Action Group and through its own internal efforts to consider its policies and practices in light of access to justice objectives.

59. As stated, The Action Group would serve, at least initially, as the mechanism by which diverse partners are brought together, supported by the facilitation and infrastructure the Law Society is able to provide. The Law Society would maintain policy governance oversight of the functioning of The Action Group only to the extent of satisfying itself that its contribution of facilitation and infrastructure remains consistent with the Law Society’s access to justice objectives more generally.
60. In addition to providing the infrastructure and facilitative support, the Law Society would participate in a substantive way as a member of The Action Group in developing the common agenda and translating The Action Group’s identified priorities into action items for consideration in Law Society business and approaches. Possible action items would, of course, be considered through the Law Society’s usual policy development and decision-making processes. Participation on The Action Group would contribute to the first key component of the proposed framework by further informing the Law Society on strategic priorities and actions it can take within its regulatory scope that will best support a more systemic reform effort.

Enhancements to the work of Law Society Committees to Support the Framework

61. A new integrated Law Society approach to access to justice presents an opportunity to rejuvenate the work of committees and build upon the solid foundations already established.

62. The framework proposed includes an ambitious goal of more fully integrating access to justice objectives across policy and program areas, by engaging in a holistic, systematic and ongoing examination of Law Society rules, regulations, policies and practices. At the outset at least, this will engage staff and benchers in a different and challenging dialogue and require considerable coordination and cooperation organizationally.

63. All committees will need to remain open to discussions of the overall access to justice and related equity agenda as the framework evolves. Committee members will be called upon to ensure its integration and success across policy and program areas, working closely with senior management and staff.

64. In recognition of the need on the part of the Law Society to approach the interrelated dimensions of the equity and access to justice issues in a coordinated and simultaneous way, there would also be value in closer cooperation between the Access to Justice Committee and the Equity and Aboriginal Issues Committee.
65. Greater coordination and cooperation between these two committees would help to ensure that equity principles inform the discussion of access to justice and that access to justice is taken into account in the formulation of equity policies and initiatives. This would allow for a sharing and integration of diverse expertise and perspectives that can be brought to bear on both equity and access issues in a focused, strategic and sustained way, enhancing the development and implementation of the new framework proposed.

66. Coordination and cooperation across all committees is expected to happen quite naturally and informally. Opportunities also exist within existing rules and operating principles that can facilitate cross-appointments, joint meetings, and other mechanisms to support the overall coordination and integration of the new framework.

67. The TAG Working Group is nonetheless mindful that more formal structures and mechanisms may be appropriate to achieving these overarching objectives of coordination and integration. There are also legitimate governance questions that have been raised by the TAG Working Group’s proposals since first introduced to Convocation in January. In order to ensure that these issues and questions are appropriately considered, the TAG Working Group recommends that these issues be referred to the Governance Working Group for further consideration and consultation, as appropriate.

Financial Implications

68. The TAG Working Group has considered the potential costs of this proposal and has determined that it would be premature to provide cost figures. In large measure, policy and administrative support to reorganized Committees and The Action Group would be realized through efficiencies achieved in the operational realignment.

69. Operating budgets, particularly to support The Action Group forum, are unknown until The Action Group has been reconstituted and agreement reached with participants on how it will function. For 2014, operating expenses will be drawn from existing budgets; requests for funding for 2015 and subsequent years will go through usual review and approval processes.

CONCLUSION

70. As the Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas Cromwell has said: access to justice is at a critical stage in this country; change is urgently needed. Because of its demonstrated ability to respond to change in the legal environment, including the integration of equity principles into its operations, the Law Society has a unique role to play in shaping the profession and fostering change within the scope of its regulatory authority.

71. It is time for the Law Society to adopt a more strategic and holistic approach to access to justice issues. The framework proposed provides a path to proceed forward in a focused and supported way. It is the next step in achieving a long-identified strategic priority of the Law Society and critical to better fulfilling its legislative mandate.

INTRODUCTION
A. PREFACE AND ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

1. THIS REPORT DEALS WITH ONE OF THE MOST VENERABLE INSTITUTIONS IN HISTORY, THE JURY. MORE SPECIFICALLY IT DEALS WITH THE LACK OF REPRESENTATION OF FIRST NATIONS PEOPLES LIVING IN RESERVE COMMUNITIES ON JURIES IN ONTARIO.

2. As with most issues involving First Nations peoples, it is difficult to deal with one issue in a discrete manner without dealing with the influences of many other factors that impact on the specific issue in question. So it is with representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries. What appears at first blush to be a narrow assignment simply on jury representation as set forth in the Order-in-Council, triggers considerations and ramifications from numerous other factors that affect the principal question of my mandate as an Independent Reviewer of the subject. Why that broader inquiry into these important factors is necessary will be dealt with in this Report.

3. However, it should be stated at the outset that, although the Independent Review is not authorized by the Order-in-Council to be a detailed examination of, and recommendations for the reform of, the justice system of the province or for improvements in social and economic programs for First Nations, these matters not only lurk in the background but are also of great relevance. In short, to ignore this background is to jeopardize the chances of making any real progress on the issue of representation of First Nations peoples on juries.

4. As this Report will demonstrate, there is not only the problem of a lack of representation of First Nations peoples on juries that is of serious proportions, but it is also regrettably the fact that the justice system generally as applied to First Nations peoples, particularly in the North, is quite frankly in a crisis. If we continue the status quo we will aggravate what is already a serious situation, and any hope of true reconciliation between First Nations and Ontarians generally will vanish. Put more directly, the time for talk is over; what is desperately needed is action.

5. Doing nothing will be a profound shame especially when there has been a greater recognition throughout Canada of the tragic history of Aboriginal people, with many examples of mistreatment, lack of respect, unsound policies, and most importantly a lack of mutual trust between Aboriginal and Non-Aboriginal people. Indeed the setting up of this Independent Review is an example of the recognition of importance of that history by the Government of Ontario and I commend them for that.

6. But if this Report and its recommendations together with their implementation are put on the shelf, we as a society will all be the worse off and the momentum for progress will likely come to a halt. The consequences of this will be very serious.

7. This Independent Review and Report were largely made possible through the efforts of First Nations people, including Chiefs, Councillors, Elders, reserve residents, provincial territorial organizations and their leaders, and even some First Nations students. To all of them I express my sincere gratitude and appreciation for their involvement, sharing their experiences, offering opinions and suggestions, and for extending hospitality and courtesy to my colleagues and me. I cannot name you all, but I can say I am indebted to all of you for your help and commitment in the work of the Review.

8. I also wish to record my gratitude to specific groups and individuals for their invaluable help. These include Nishnawbe Aski Nation (former Deputy Grand Chief Terry Waboose and former Grand Chief Bentley Cheechoo), their counsel Julian Falconer, Julian Roy, Meaghan Daniel, all of whom played a central role in the launching of the Independent Review and organizing visits to reserves in the North which were most important in obtaining the views of First Nations members in different contexts and with different experiences. Also, I would like to thank the Union of Ontario Indians and their counsel Austin Acton, the Chiefs of Ontario, Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto and their counsel Christa Big Canoe and Jonathan Rudin. My thanks also go to then Grand Chief Diane Kelly and her colleagues on the Treaty 3 Council of Chiefs. Thanks are also due to Irwin Elman, the Provincial Advocate for Children and...
Youth. I would also like to thank Marlene Pierre, Sharon Smoke, Chris Moonias and Bruce Moonias, all of whom are family members of First Nation victims whose deaths were subject to a coroner’s inquest, for sharing their grief with us and their submissions on coroners inquests and related matters.

9. We received considerable help and cooperation from officials at the Ministry of the Attorney General, Ontario Court Services, the Provincial Jury Centre, and judges of the Superior Court and Ontario Court of Justice and their officials. We have had the benefit of a paper describing experiences of jury role processes in other jurisdictions, prepared by former Attorney General Michael J. Bryant, who currently works as a consultant on Aboriginal issues.

10. For special recognition, I would like to acknowledge the former Attorney General Chris Bentley and current Attorney General John Gerretsen for their cooperation and support. I should also wish to thank especially Murray Segal, the former Deputy Attorney General of Ontario, for his instrumental role in setting up the Independent Review and collaborative effort to support the Review in every way. Thanks are also due to Acting Deputy Attorney General Mark Leach for his cooperation and help.

11. Finally, I should like to thank my team: John Terry, Counsel to the Independent Review, and Candice Metallic, Associate Counsel to the Review. No one could have better or more talented colleagues with whom to work than those two. They played an immensely important role in all phases of the Review and I thank them profoundly. I would also like to thank Nick Kennedy and Ryan Lax, who greatly helped us in the finalization of the Report.

12. Much time, effort and commitment has gone into the preparation of this Report by all those I have mentioned. I believe I express the sentiment of all concerned that improvements to the jury representation of First Nations peoples will be significantly advanced as a result of our collective efforts.

13. We also share a dream that the jury representation changes will spawn other needed improvements to the justice system and to the relationship between Ontario and First Nations peoples.

B. INTRODUCTION AND EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. INTRODUCTION

14. This Report will, I hope, be a wake-up call to all who are concerned with the administration of justice in Ontario. As I stated in the Preface above, it has become clear to me in carrying out this Independent Review that the justice system, as it relates to First Nations peoples, and particularly in Northern Ontario, is in crisis. Overrepresented in the prison population, First Nations peoples are significantly underrepresented, not just on juries, but among all those who work in the administration of justice in this province, whether as court officials, prosecutors, defence counsel, or judges. This issue is made more acute by the fact that Aboriginal peoples constitute the fastest-growing group within our population, with a median age that is significantly lower than the median age of the rest of the population.

15. The problem that is the specific focus of this Report – the underrepresentation of individuals living on reserves on Ontario’s jury roll – is a symptom of this crisis. It is that narrow problem, and the concerns it raises about the fairness of our jury system, that have rightly prompted the Government of Ontario to arrange for this Independent Review to be carried out. But an examination of that problem leads inexorably to a set of broader and systemic issues that are at the heart of the current dysfunctional relationship between Ontario’s justice system and Aboriginal peoples in this province. It is these broad problems that must be tackled if we are to make any significant progress in dealing with the underrepresentation of First Nations individuals on juries. And it is this systemic approach to the issues which has guided me in the conduct of my review and the formulation of my recommendations, as discussed below.
2. MY MANDATE AND WORK

16. I was appointed to carry out this Independent Review by Order-In-Council 1388/2011, dated August 11, 2011. The Order-in-Council, a copy of which is attached as Appendix A to this Report, directed me to make recommendations:

   (a) to ensure and enhance the representation of First Nations persons living on reserve communities on the jury roll; and
   (b) to strengthen the understanding, cooperation and relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations on this issue.

17. I commenced my work in Fall 2011 after assembling a small legal team to assist me. We began the Review by developing a process to gather information from all of those who have been involved in, or are affected by, the juries system in Ontario as it relates to the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll. After creating a website for the Independent Review, we set out to develop a process that would allow us to meet and receive submissions from interested First Nations leaders, communities and organizations, officials of the Ministry of Attorney General, Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care, the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth, other service organizations and members of the judiciary who have presided over cases or motions relating to the issues under review.

18. Hearing from the First Nations leadership, people, and organizations as the first order of business was the best way, in my view, for me to understand and accurately define the systemic issues affecting First Nations peoples living in reserve communities as it relates to jury service. Given the vast diversity of First Nations and Treaty groups and organizations in the Province of Ontario, we determined that the engagement process must begin by introducing the Independent Review to First Nations and inviting them to participate in a manner they deemed appropriate. Accordingly, in November 2011, I sent a letter to all First Nations governments and First Nations and Treaty organizations in Ontario offering to meet with them, receive written submissions, or accommodate a combination of both. A copy of this correspondence is attached as Appendix D to this Report.

19. Between November 2011 and May 2012, I met with the leadership and people from 32 First Nations, mostly within their communities, and four First Nation organizations. This engagement included meetings with First Nations that are members of the Nishnawbe Aski Nation, the Union of Ontario Indians, Grand Council Treaty #3, as well as four First Nations that are unaffiliated with a tribal council or First Nations organization. The list of First Nations that I visited during this phase of the Review is attached as Appendix E to my Report. We also met with representatives of Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto, who convened a Families Forum at which my team and I met with some family members of First Nations victims whose deaths were subject to a coroner’s inquest. Overall, the cumulative meetings and discussions with every person involved helped shape my understanding of the systemic and procedural issues impacting the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll in Ontario.

20. Following the First Nations engagement process, I prepared a progress report and a discussion paper, attached as Appendix F to this Report, that I sent to all First Nations in Ontario, First Nation and Treaty organizations, and interested Aboriginal service providers, seeking their further input. The discussion paper set out the issues identified by First Nations during the engagement process and posed questions to solicit feedback on ways to address the challenges associated with the representation of First Nations peoples on juries.

21. Once I became familiar with the issues from the First Nations perspective, we met and had discussions with officials from the Ministry of the Attorney General, including the Court Services Division and the Provincial Jury Centre. We also met with some members of the judiciary who have presided over many cases involving First Nations offenders. Considering the large demographic of First Nations youth in Ontario, we also thought it useful to meet with the Provincial Advocate of Children and Youth in Ontario.
22. We received many written submissions as a result of the engagement process and the feedback requested through the discussion paper, including from, among others, Nishnawbe Aski Nation, the Union of Ontario Indians, the Chiefs of Ontario, Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto, the Office of the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth in Ontario, and Legal Aid Ontario.

23. Following receipt of written submissions in early July 2012, I prepared my Report based on all the information received through meetings and written submissions and further research and analysis carried out by my team and me. The Report was substantially completed by the end of August 2012 and provided to translators in early September 2012 for translation into French, Cree, Ojibway, Oji-Cree and Mohawk.

3. ISSUES IDENTIFIED DURING VISITS AND MEETINGS

24. My meetings with First Nations leaders, Elders, people, technicians and service providers from 32 communities during the engagement process played a crucial role in helping me understand the systemic and procedural issues affecting the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll in Ontario. During all these meetings, one point was resoundingly clear: substantive and systemic changes to the criminal justice system are necessary conditions for the participation of First Nations peoples on juries in Ontario.

25. Aside from the issues regarding the most effective manner to obtain names of First Nations reserve residents for the purposes of the jury roll, the fact is that many First Nations people are plainly reluctant to participate in the jury system. Many reasons exist for that reticence, and I heard them repeatedly throughout the engagement process.

26. First, First Nations leaders and people spoke about the conflict that exists between First Nations’ cultural values, laws, and ideologies regarding traditional approaches to conflict resolution, and the values and laws that underpin the Canadian justice system. The objective of the traditional First Nations’ approach to justice is to re-attain harmony, balance, and healing with respect to a particular offence, rather than seeking retribution and punishment. First Nations people observe the Canadian justice system as devoid of any reflection of their core principles or values, and view it as a foreign system that has been imposed upon them without their consent.

27. Second, First Nations people often spoke of the systemic discrimination that either they or their families have experienced within the justice system in relation to criminal justice or child welfare. These experiences with the criminal justice system, along with historic limitations on the rights of First Nations people, have created negative perspectives and an inter-generational mistrust of the criminal justice system. Such perceptions, by implication, extend to participation in the jury process. First Nations people generally view the criminal justice system as working against them, rather than for them. It is an affront to them to participate in the delivery of this system of justice.

28. Third, First Nations people lack knowledge and awareness of the justice system generally, and the jury system in particular. It was understandably expressed that most First Nations individuals will refrain from participating in a process they know nothing about. Many First Nations people were unaware that the same jury roll was used to select juries for both trials and coroner’s inquests. Therefore, most leaders identified the need for a focused and sustained education strategy for First Nations communities with respect to the role of juries in the justice system and the process by which jury rolls and jury panels are created, as well as the rights of individuals accused of offences and the rights of victims.

29. Fourth, First Nations leaders resoundingly and assertively expressed the desire to assume more control of community justice matters as an element of what they strongly believe is their inherent right to self-government, and at the very least be involved in developing solutions to the jury representation issue. Having been introduced to community-based restorative justice initiatives in previous years, First Nations experienced the benefits to their communities that came from the development of a culturally-appropriate... approach to justice. However, these programs were discontinued owing to funding cuts and will require financial resources and capacity to be resumed. First Nations leaders were unequivocal that re-introducing restorative justice programs would have multiple benefits at the community level. Such benefits include the delivery of justice in a culturally relevant manner; greater understanding of justice at the community level, increased community involvement in the implementation of justice and, finally, an opportunity to educate people about the justice system and their responsibility to become engaged on the juries when called upon to do so.

30. Fifth, the issue of local police services arose in many discussions throughout the engagement process. It became very clear that inadequate police services and associated funding contribute to negative perceptions of the criminal justice system. Many First Nations were very concerned about the limited and under-resourced police services and the lack of sufficient training for them. Some First Nations leaders expressed frustration regarding the lack of enforcement of First Nation by-laws.

31. A common theme expressed by First Nations leaders was concern for the protection of the privacy rights of their citizens with respect to the unauthorized disclosure of personal information for the purposes of compiling the jury roll. Confusion with respect to the obligations of First Nations governments in this regard appears to be related to different positions taken by Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development (formerly Indian and Northern Affairs Canada) since 2001. The difficulty of creating and maintaining a single source list of individual residents that includes dates of birth and addresses on reserve is a real challenge because First Nations governments do not typically possess such a list. As an alternative, many First Nations leaders proposed that jury service ought to be voluntary and expressed a willingness to help facilitate such an approach. First Nations representatives also stated that the process to collect names for the purposes of the jury roll must be clear, tangible and consistent throughout all judicial districts in which First Nations are located.

32. First Nations peoples’ willingness to participate in the jury process is also negatively affected by the content of the jury questionnaire. There are a number of features that First Nations people identified as discouraging them from responding. First, the statement of penalty of a fine or imprisonment for non-response within five days is viewed as coercive and inappropriately imposing jury duty through intimidation and threat, and the time frame of five days for response is thought to be unreasonable. Second, the requirement to declare Canadian citizenship prompts many to answer in the negative. However, it was expressed that if there were an option to declare First Nation citizenship or membership, many more First Nations people would respond positively, thereby increasing the number of eligible First Nations jurors. Third, the language requirement for juror eligibility, being English or French, is problematic for First Nations people whose primary language is their indigenous language. It was suggested that broadening the number of languages, along with the provision of translation services, would enhance First Nations responses to jury questionnaires and participation. It was suggested that an exemption be created for First Nations elected leadership, akin to the exemption for federal, provincial and municipal elected officials. Finally, it was explained that First Nations’ lack of understanding of the jury selection process and role of juries served as a barrier to responding to jury questionnaires.

33. The engagement process also identified many practical barriers that exist with respect to the participation of First Nations peoples on juries, particularly in northern Ontario. These barriers include: the cost of transportation, where travel arrangements are not pre-arranged by the Court Services Division; inadequate allowances for accommodation and meals; the absence of child and elder care as eligible costs; and lack of income supplements. Further, community-based supports were viewed as a required service to assist with process logistics. Finally, the existence of criminal records and lack of knowledge and access to pardon procedures serves to exclude many potential First Nations jurors.

34. Many First Nations people, specifically those who unfortunately are, or have been, involved in coroner’s inquests related to the death of a family member in state care, appreciate the importance of a coroner’s jury that is representative of First Nations peoples and were interested in participating in coroner’s inquests. They were anxious to see the resolution of this issue so the investigations into the deaths can proceed.
35. First Nations leaders unequivocally asserted that the way forward with respect to enhancing a relationship with the Ministry of the Attorney General in the context of the jury system, and all justice matters, is through a government-to-government relationship and a process that reflects such a relationship. First Nations seek greater control of the justice system as it applies to their people and view the re-integration of restorative justice programs as one measure to achieve this goal. The need for a collaborative approach to develop a proper jury roll process for First Nations peoples on reserve is viewed as a necessary step forward in a respectful relationship. Moreover, partnering with First Nations with respect to educational initiatives aimed at First Nations and government officials would contribute to improving the relationship.

36. Government officials with whom I spoke echoed the need for measures to substantially increase the participation of First Nations reserve residents on juries, in addition to obtaining reliable records required to prepare a representative jury roll. Court officials in the Kenora District, and more recently Thunder Bay, have undertaken various efforts to reach out to First Nations to obtain residence information and have undertaken programs to educate and inform First Nations communities about the jury system. However, we heard a consensus view among government officials that significant improvements are necessary. Using the data held by the Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) as one source list of names, addresses and dates of birth of reserve residents, coupled with information-sharing agreements or memoranda of understanding to protect the confidentiality of such information, is an approach worthy of further exploration and discussion with First Nations leadership. Moreover, educational efforts similar to the initiative undertaken by the Ministry of Attorney General and the Union of Ontario Indians and the Grand Council of Treaty #3 to conduct Jury Forums in 15 First Nations could be used as an ongoing measure to educate First Nations peoples on the subject of juries. Other creative approaches were suggested to minimize the burden on First Nations, such as the use of video conferencing technology for the jury selection process and Superior Court of Justice sittings in select First Nations communities.

4. WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS

37. In addition to certain written submissions I received during the engagement sessions, I also received helpful and detailed written submissions at the conclusion of the engagement process from six organizations: Nishnawbe Aski Nation, Union of Ontario Indians, Chiefs of Ontario, Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto, the Office of the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth, and Legal Aid Ontario. These organizations’ submissions were consistent with the views I heard from First Nations people during the engagement process, emphasizing, among other things, the need to address jury roll reform in partnership with First Nations. As the Nishnawbe Aski Nation stated in its submissions, the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries “is but one symptom of a larger problem of alienation and exclusion of First Nations people within the justice system.”

38. The submissions offered many recommendations on ways in which the systemic and procedural issues related to the jury roll could be addressed. The matters addressed in the recommendations included, among other things: enhancement of community or restorative justice programs; improvements to the operation of the justice system in northern Ontario; uniform coordination and implementation of section 6(8) of the Juries Act; the involvement of First Nations peoples in compiling the jury roll; increased language supports with respect to juror questionnaires and translation services; increased juror remuneration and expense allocations; the recruitment of First Nations liaisons; revising the juror questionnaires; meaningful educational, outreach and training initiatives, especially for youth; measures to address inadequate police services in order to increase confidence in the justice system; and the need to take prompt and assertive steps to improve the relationship between First Nations and the Attorney General.

39. I am grateful for the thought and effort that these organizations demonstrated in providing me with these very comprehensive submissions and recommendations.
5. HISTORICAL, LEGAL AND COMPARATIVE RESEARCH

40. In addition to the engagement process and submissions described above, my team and I carried out research respecting various issues, including the history of juries and jury selection in Ontario, the requirement that a jury be representative, and the history and practice with respect to the representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries. Juries have served for generations as the cornerstone of our justice system, as well as a fundamental institution in the administration of justice in civilizations dating back to ancient times. Unfortunately, however, the jury system as it has developed and operated in Ontario, like Ontario’s justice system in general, has not often been a friend to Aboriginal persons in Ontario. Indeed, criminal jury trials in Canada were used at times as a tool to punish what the British viewed as disloyal behavior on the part of Aboriginal people, and to persecute the customary practices of First Nations on the grounds that they constituted criminal behaviour.

41. Our research focused in particular on the application of, and case law respecting, the requirement in section 6(8) of the Juries Act for the sherriff “to obtain the names of inhabitants of the reserve from any record available.” It is clear to me as a result of this research and in particular the materials filed in conjunction with recent court cases respecting this matter that the current reliance by Court Services officials on obtaining the names from Band List information, though resulting from well-meaning efforts, is ad hoc and leads in many cases to out-of-date and otherwise unreliable information being used to compile the jury roll.

42. In accordance with paragraph 4 of the Order-in-Council, I also considered the law and practice in other jurisdictions to assess what lessons we can learn from them. Underrepresentation of Aboriginal peoples on juries is by no means exclusively an Ontarian or Canadian issue. Rather, this issue exists in various jurisdictions that rely on juries and that have sizeable Aboriginal populations, including other Canadian provinces, New Zealand, Australia and the United States. In reviewing law and practice in other jurisdictions, I had the benefit of a paper describing experiences of jury role processes in other jurisdictions prepared by former Attorney General Michael J. Bryant, who currently works as a consultant on Aboriginal issues.

43. I found this review of experience in other jurisdictions to be very helpful. It showed, among other things, that many other Canadian provincial governments rely on health insurance records as a source for compiling the jury roll. The review also revealed a number of practices in other jurisdictions that I have recommended be considered or studied for potential use in Ontario, including allowing individuals to volunteer for jury service as a supplemental source list (as is allowed in New York State), holding court hearings in remote communities, and drawing jurors from residents living reasonably close to where the hearing is held (as is done in the Northwest Territories and Alaska), and, when a jury summons or questionnaire is undeliverable or is not returned, sending another summons or questionnaire to a resident of the same postal code, thereby ensuring that nonresponsive prospective jurors do not undermine jury representativeness (an approach adopted in some U.S. states to respond to underrepresentation of minorities on juries).

6. RECOMMENDATIONS

44. As a result of the engagement process, review of submissions, and research and analysis as described above, I make the following 17 major recommendations.

RECOMMENDATION 1: the Ministry of the Attorney General establish an Implementation Committee consisting of a substantial First Nations membership along with Government officials and individuals who could, because of their background or expertise, contribute significantly to the work of the Implementation Committee. This Committee would be responsible for the oversight of the implementation of the below recommendations and related matters. In view of the importance and urgency of the matter, I recommend that the Committee be established as soon as practicably possible.

RECOMMENDATION 3: after obtaining the input of the Implementation Committee, the Ministry of the Attorney General provide cultural training for all government officials working in the justice system who have contact with First Nations peoples, including police, court workers, Crown prosecutors, prison guards and other related agencies.

RECOMMENDATION 4: the Ministry of the Attorney General carry out the following studies for eventual input by the Implementation Committee:

(a) a study on legal representation that would involve Legal Aid Ontario, particularly in the north, that would cover a variety of topics, including the adequacy of existing legal representation, the location and schedule of court sittings, and related matters.

(b) a study on First Nations policing issues, including the recognition of First Nations police forces through enabling legislation, the establishment of a regulatory body to oversee the operation of First Nations law enforcement programs, the creation of an independent review board to adjudicate policing complaints, and the development of mandatory cultural competency training for OPP officers; and

(c) a review of the Aboriginal Court Worker program and an examination of resources required to improve the program.

RECOMMENDATION 5: the Ministry of the Attorney General create an Assistant Deputy Attorney General (ADAG) position responsible for Aboriginal issues, including the implementation of this Report.

RECOMMENDATION 6: after obtaining the input of the Implementation Committee, the Ministry of the Attorney General provide broader and more comprehensive justice education programs for First Nations individuals, including:

(a) developing brochures in First Nations languages with plain wording which provide comprehensive information on the justice system, including information respecting the role played by criminal, civil, and coroner’s juries;

(b) establishing First Nations liaison officers responsible for consulting with First Nations reserves on juries and on justice issues;

(c) commissioning the creation of video or other educational instruments, particularly in First Nations languages, that would be used to educate First Nations individuals as to the role played by the jury in the justice system and the importance of participating on the jury; and considering the feasibility of a program that would enlist students from Ontario law schools to participate in intensive summer education and legal assistance programs for First Nations representatives, dealing with the justice system generally and the jury system in particular, in consultation with Chiefs, and Court Services officials.

RECOMMENDATION 7: with respect to First Nations youth, in addition to having a youth member on the Implementation Committee, the Implementation Committee should request that the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth facilitate a conference of representative youth members from First Nations reserves to focus on specific issues in the relationship between youth, juries, and the justice system, addressed in this report. The Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth should prepare a report on that conference; prior to submitting the report to the Implementation Committee the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth should consult with PTOs and other First Nations associations.

RECOMMENDATION 8: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, undertake a prompt and urgent review of the feasibility of, and mechanisms for, using the OHIP database to generate a database of First Nations individuals living on reserve for the purposes of compiling the jury roll.

RECOMMENDATION 9: in connection with this review, the Ministry of Attorney General and First Nations, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider all other potential sources for generating this database, including band residency information, Ministry of Transportation information and other records, and steps that might be taken to secure these records, such as a renewed memorandum of understanding between Ontario and the Federal government respecting band residency information or memorandums of understanding between Ontario and PTOs or First Nations, as appropriate.

RECOMMENDATION 10: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider amending the questionnaire sent to prospective jurors to:

(a) make the language as simple as possible;

(b) translate the questionnaire into First Nations languages as appropriate;

(c) remove the wording threatening a fine for non-compliance and replacing it with wording stating simply that Ontario law requires the recipient to complete and return the form because of the importance of the jury in ensuring fair trials under Ontario’s justice system;

(d) on the premise that a First Nations member living on reserve in Ontario satisfies the Canadian citizenship requirement under s. 2(b) of the Juries Act, add an option for First Nations individual to identify themselves as First Nations members or citizens rather than Canadian citizens;

(e) enable First Nations elected officials, such as Chiefs and Councillors, as well as Elders, to be excluded from jury duty; and

(f) provide, through an amendment to the Juries Act, for a more realistic period than the current five days for the return of jury questionnaires.

RECOMMENDATION 11: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider implementing the practice from parts of the U.S., that when a jury summons or questionnaire is undeliverable or is not returned, another summons or questionnaire is sent out to a resident of the same postal code, thereby ensuring that nonresponsive prospective jurors do not undermine jury representativeness.
RECOMMENDATION 12: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider a procedure whereby First Nations people on reserve could volunteer for jury service as a means of supplementing other jury source lists.

RECOMMENDATION 13: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider enabling First Nations people not fluent in English or French to serve on juries by providing translation services and by amending the jury questionnaire accordingly to reflect this change.

RECOMMENDATION 14: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, adopt measures to respond to the problem of First Nations individuals with criminal records for minor offences being automatically excluded from jury duty by:

(a) amending the Juries Act provisions that exclude individuals who have been convicted of certain offences from inclusion on the jury roll, to make them consistent with the relevant Criminal Code provisions, which exclude a narrower group of individuals;

(b) encouraging and providing advice and support for First Nations individuals to apply for pardons to remove criminal records; and

(c) considering whether, after a certain period of time, an individual previously convicted of certain offences could become eligible again for jury service.
RECOMMENDATION 15: the Ministry of the Attorney General discuss with the Implementation Committee the advisability of recommending to the Attorney General of Canada an amendment to the Criminal Code that would prevent the use of peremptory challenges to discriminate against First Nations people serving on juries.

RECOMMENDATION 16: in view of the concerns I have heard and the fact that current jury compensation is not consistent with cost-of-living increases, I recommend that the Ministry of the Attorney General refer the issue of jury member compensation to the Implementation Committee for consideration and recommendation.

RECOMMENDATION 17: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, institute a process that would allow for First Nations individuals to volunteer to be on the jury roll for the purposes of empanelling a jury for a coroner’s inquest.

45. For a complete explanation of the recommendations, see paragraphs 347 to 386.

7. ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

46. The preparation of this Report would not have been possible without the participation and assistance of many First Nations people, including Chiefs, Councillors, Elders, members of reserves, provincial territorial organizations and their leaders, and even some First Nations students. I also benefitted greatly from the contributions of the lawyers who acted for various organizations and from government officials, all of whom were very fair and candid in their assessments of the shortcomings of current conditions.

47. It is my sincere hope that the trust that First Nations people have invested in this Independent Review process will be rewarded with prompt response and action by the Government of Ontario.
PART II

APPOINTMENT AND WORK OF THE INDEPENDENT REVIEW
A. MANDATE OF THE INDEPENDENT REVIEW

48. I WAS APPOINTED TO CARRY OUT THIS INDEPENDENT REVIEW BY ORDER-IN-COUNCIL 1388/2011, DATED AUGUST 11, 2011. THE ORDER-IN-COUNCIL, A COPY OF WHICH IS ATTACHED AS APPENDIX A TO THIS REPORT, DIRECTED ME TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS:

(a) to ensure and enhance the representation of First Nations persons living on reserve communities on the jury roll; and

(b) to strengthen the understanding, cooperation and relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations on this issue.

49. The Order-in-Council responds to the fundamental problem of lack of representation of members of Ontario’s First Nations communities on Ontario’s jury roll. As described in this Report, this problem appears not only to have been longstanding, but to have worsened over the past decade. It was brought to a head as a result of a series of cases that arose over the last several years, two of which have made their way to the Court of Appeal for Ontario.

50. The first of the recent set of cases involved the empanelment of juries in coroner’s inquests into the deaths of individuals living in First Nations communities. At the commencement of the inquests into the deaths of Jacy Pierre and Reggie Bushie, the families of the deceased contacted the Office of the Coroner and the Attorney General to express their concern about the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll for the District of Thunder Bay. Their concern was prompted by the discovery made during the 2008 inquest into the deaths of Jamie Goodwin and Ricardo Wesley (“the Kashechewan Inquest”) that the Kenora District jury rolls contained names of members of only 14 of the 49 First Nations represented by Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN) and that not a single member of the Kaschechewan First Nation was listed on the Kenora jury roll.2

51. Each family – and in the Bushie inquest, NAN – asked the presiding coroner to issue a summons to the Director of Court Operations so they could find out how the jury roll in the District of Thunder Bay was established. Both coroners refused to issue a summons. The Pierre family and NAN applied for judicial review of each coroner’s decision and a stay of the inquests pending the hearing of their application. The court granted a stay of the Bushie inquest but refused to stay the Pierre inquest, which proceeded and was completed without the participation of the Pierre family. The Divisional Court dismissed the applications for judicial review. The Court of Appeal, in a decision reported as Pierre v. McRae (also referred to as NAN v. Eden), overturned this decision.3 The Court of Appeal held that the families of Mr. Bushie and Mr. Pierre had adduced sufficient evidence to justify an inquiry into the representativeness of the jury rolls. The Court also ordered that the Director of Court Operations appear before both inquests to testify about the establishment of jury rolls in the Thunder Bay District. Following the Court of Appeal’s decision, the coroner in the Bushie Inquest determined that the Thunder Bay District’s jury roll was not representative, and ordered that the inquest be stayed until a representative jury roll is created.

52. The second set of proceedings arose out of appeals brought by First Nations defendants to set aside their criminal convictions on the basis that lack of representation of First Nations peoples on jury rolls had infringed their right to a representative jury. The defendant in R. v. Kokopenace learned of the Bushie inquest and the surrounding legal proceedings, and appealed his conviction on several grounds, including the unrepresentativeness of the jury roll for the Thunder Bay District.4 The Court of Appeal dismissed all non-jury grounds of appeal, but adjourned the appeal to hear arguments about the jury composition issue. The defendant in R v. Spiers appealed her conviction, and also pursued the jury composition issue. These appeals were heard together by the Court of Appeal in May 2012, but at the time of writing the Court had not rendered its decision.

53. NAN is the political territorial organization representing the political, social and economic interests of 49 First Nations Reserve communities in Ontario. NAN’s initiatives, aimed at addressing the issue of the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on jury rolls, began following the Kaschechewan Inquest. NAN became involved in the Bushie Inquest on behalf of Mr. Bushie’s family, and brought the appeals described above to the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal. NAN also intervened in the Kokopenace and Spiers appeals. Through its participation in the coroners inquests, the subsequent legal challenges and political action, NAN has been instrumental in helping to focus public and judicial scrutiny on the issue of Aboriginal underrepresentation on Ontario jury rolls and in setting up this Independent Review.

54. The mandate set out in the Order-in-Council is both relatively narrow and broad. On the one hand, I have been asked to examine the specific issue of lack of representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario’s jury roll, and my recommendations are focused on that issue. On the other hand, there is a recognition in the Order-in-Council of the need to strengthen “the understanding, cooperation and relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations” in relation to the jury representation issue. As the Attorney General stated in his factum filed in the Kokopenace and Spiers appeals, my mandate is to probe “the important systemic issues surrounding low participation of Aboriginal people on juries.” As described further in this Report, in investigating these systemic issues, it has become clear to me that the issue of underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll in this province is merely a symptom of the broader disease afflicting Ontario’s justice system as it relates to First Nations peoples in Ontario. Consequently, while I appreciate that my mandate is first and foremost to address the issue of the lack of representation of First Nations community members on the jury roll, I have found that this issue cannot be realistically addressed without considering these broader systemic issues.

55. I should also note that the Order-in-Council expressly directs me not to address certain matters in carrying out my review, and consequently I have not done so. For example, paragraph 7 of the Order-in-Council states that I shall not report “on any individual cases that are, have been, or may be subject to a criminal investigation or proceeding, inquest or other legal proceeding”. As a result, although my Report makes reference to the jurisprudence relating to these matters as part of the background and context for my recommendations, I do not report on or make recommendations with respect to any of these individual cases. In addition, as required by paragraph 8 of the Order-in-Council, I have taken care to perform my duties without making any findings of fact in relation to misconduct, or expressing any conclusions or recommendations regarding the civil or criminal liability of any person or organization, and without interfering in any investigation or criminal or other legal proceeding.

56. The heart of my mandate is addressed in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Order-in-Council, which direct me, in the conduct of my review, to hold consultations with First Nations communities and to invite and receive submissions in writing from any First Nation, First Nations political territorial organization, First Nations organization, and member of a First Nation as well as from any interested party, including ministries of government. It is through this consultation process, described in detail in the next section of the Report, that I have gained the greatest understanding of the fundamental systemic problems that underlie the issues I have been directed to review.

B. WORK OF THE INDEPENDENT REVIEW

57. Shortly following the passage of Order-in-Council 1288/2011 on August 11, 2011, I began to assemble the legal team that would support my work for the Independent Review. John Terry, a partner with Torys LLP, was the first to join the team as lead counsel. In October, we recruited as associate counsel Candice Metallic, then a senior associate and now a partner with Maurice Law, Barristers and Solicitors. Together, my team and I began to develop a plan and engagement approach for the Independent Review.

58. We commenced the Independent Review with a process to gather information from all of those who have been involved in, or are affected by, the juries system in Ontario as it relates to the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll. After creating a website for the Independent Review, we set out to develop a process that would allow us to meet and receive submissions from interested First Nations leaders, communities and organizations, officials of the Ministry of Attorney General, Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care, the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth, other service organizations, and members of the judiciary who have presided over cases or motions relating to the issues under review.

59. Hearing from the First Nations leadership, people and organizations as the first order of business was the best way, in my view, for me to understand and accurately define the systemic issues affecting First Nations peoples living in reserve communities as it relates to jury service. Given the vast diversity of First Nations and Treaty groups and organizations in the Province of Ontario, we determined that the engagement process must begin by introducing the Independent Review and inviting First Nations to participate in a manner they deemed appropriate. Accordingly, in November 2011, I sent a letter to all First Nations governments, and First Nations and Treaty organizations in Ontario, offering to meet with them, receive written submissions or accommodate a combination of both. A copy of this correspondence is attached as Appendix D to this Report.

60. Following the First Nations engagement process, described in more detail in Part IV, I prepared a Progress Report and a discussion paper that set out the issues identified by First Nations during the engagement process, and posed questions to solicit feedback on ways to address the challenges associated with the representation of First Nations peoples on juries. I prepared a summary progress report that was made available on our website, and a discussion paper that was sent to all First Nations in Ontario, First Nation and Treaty organizations, and interested Aboriginal service providers, seeking their further input. It is attached as Appendix F to this Report. The submissions we received are summarized in Part IV of this Report.

61. Once I became familiar with the issues from the First Nations perspective, we began to meet and have discussions with officials from the Ministry of the Attorney General, including the Court Services Division and the Provincial Jury Centre. We also met with some members of the judiciary who have presided over many cases involving First Nations offenders. Considering the large demographic of First Nations youth in Ontario, we also thought it useful to meet with the Provincial Advocate of Children and Youth in Ontario.

1. NISHNAWBE ASKI NATION

62. As described at paragraph 53 above, NAN had been intensely involved in legal and advocacy events leading up to the creation of the Independent Review. Accordingly, they were the first organization to submit a proposal for engagement, which we accepted. NAN proposed an engagement process similar to that adopted by Commissioner Mr. Justice Goudge in the Inquiry into Pediatric Forensic Pathology in Ontario. This approach entailed a preparatory meeting in each of the selected First Nations communities, followed by a meeting between community representatives, my team, and me. The preparatory team consisted of a NAN representative, former Grand Chief Bentley Cheechoo, and a translator, Jerry Sawanas, who provided advice and information required by each First Nation with which we met. NAN’s legal team of two lawyers from the law firm Falconer Charney accompanied the NAN representatives to provide legal advice on the issues. The objectives of the preparatory meetings were to educate the leadership and community with respect to the jury representation issue, to address any questions or concerns that may be raised, and to ensure that the community was sufficiently prepared for my visit. Following the preparatory meetings, a second visit was arranged whereby my legal team, NAN's preparatory team, and I attended the First Nations communities to discuss the issues.

63. As an important backdrop to the Independent Review, I want to acknowledge the seven young men from NAN First Nations who died while attending the Dennis Franklin Cromarty High School in Thunder Bay. In selecting the First Nations to be involved in the Independent Review engagement process, NAN respectfully and appropriately included the home First Nations of the young men who died in Thunder Bay, and also considered factors such as geographic location, size, and Tribal Council affiliation. Fifteen of NAN's 49 First Nations were identified by NAN to be visited during the Review. Owing to unanticipated events, such as inclement weather, deaths in the community, and other pressing matters that arose in First Nations communities, I was able to visit ten of the fifteen communities. The list of First Nations that I visited during this phase of the Review is attached as Appendix E to my Report. The outcomes of these sessions are summarized in Part IV of my Report.

2. UNION OF ONTARIO INDIANS

64. The Union of Ontario Indians, a political advocate for 39 Anishinabek First Nations in Ontario, submitted an engagement proposal and budget on behalf of its members, which we accepted. Having recently participated in a previous initiative funded by the Ministry of the Attorney General to conduct three discussion forums regarding juries in Anishinabek territory, the Union built upon this previous work and proposed to undertake five tasks for the Independent Review.

65. First, the Union assembled a steering committee that designed a process to engage their constituent First Nations in the Independent Review. Second, the Union prepared plain language backgronders regarding the issue of the representation of First Nations peoples on juries for the purposes of dissemination in Anishinabek First Nations and institutions. Third, the Union commissioned external research reports to harness the knowledge, opinions, and suggestions of key organizations in the region. The authors of the independent research papers attended the engagement sessions to present their research and to contribute to fruitful discussions. These independent research reports are summarized in Part IV of this Report. Fourth, the Union originally planned to organize three consultation meetings at which First Nations individuals, leaders, and I were invited to attend to discuss the issue of the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on juries. Of these three sessions, two were convened and one was cancelled. The summary of these sessions is found in Part IV of this Report. Finally, the Union prepared a Research Report and Submission that drew upon the outcomes of the Anishinabek engagement sessions as the basis for the Union's recommendations to me. The Union's submission is summarized in Part IV of this Report.

3. GRAND COUNCIL OF TREATY #3

66. The then Grand Chief of Treaty #3, Diane Kelly, and Chief Simon Fobister of Grassy Narrows First Nation met with me to discuss the issue of the representation of First Nations peoples on juries. After this meeting, the Grand Council of Treaty #3 submitted a proposal for a one-day meeting that was held at Wauzhushk Onigum First Nation, just outside Kenora. Eight Chiefs of Treaty #3 attended, along with technical advisors and Elders. The summary of this meeting appears in Part IV of this Report.
4. ABORIGINAL LEGAL SERVICES OF TORONTO

67. Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto (ALST) submitted a two-part proposal, which we accepted. The first part involved the preparation of a comprehensive paper that addresses the jury representation issue and offers recommendations and solutions to the current problem of the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries. ALST’s comprehensive paper is summarized in Part IV of this Report. The second part of ALST’s proposal involved convening a Families Forum at which my team and I met with some family members of First Nations victims whose deaths were subject to a coroner’s inquest. The summary of this meeting is included in Part IV of this Report.

5. INDEPENDENT FIRST NATIONS

68. Finally, I received specific meeting requests from four First Nations that are unaffiliated with a tribal council or First Nation organization, which I gladly attended.

69. It is also important to note that we received submissions from various groups and individuals as outlined in Part IV.

70. I am most grateful to all of the First Nations and First Nation organizations that participated in the Independent Review. Their valuable assistance, generous contributions, and insightful perspectives have been of great benefit to me in writing my Report and developing the recommendations that, in my view, are required to enhance First Nations inclusion and participation on juries in Ontario. I am also equally grateful to the many judges, and court and government officials, who presented information, data, insights, and comments on the subject matter of the Review.
PART III
THE JURY SYSTEM AND FIRST NATIONS: PAST AND PRESENT
A. INTRODUCTION

71. JURIES HAVE SERVED FOR GENERATIONS AS THE CORNERSTONE OF OUR JUSTICE SYSTEM, AS WELL AS A FUNDAMENTAL INSTITUTION IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN CIVILIZATIONS DATING BACK TO ANCIENT TIMES. UNFORTUNATELY, HOWEVER, AS I DESCRIBE BELOW, IT IS CLEAR THAT THE JURY SYSTEM AS IT HAS DEVELOPED AND OPERATED IN ONTARIO, LIKE ONTARIO’S JUSTICE SYSTEM IN GENERAL, HAS NOT OFTEN BEEN A FRIEND TO ABORIGINAL PEOPLE IN ONTARIO.

72. In this part of the Report, I describe a brief history of juries in Ontario, the jury selection system as it currently operates in Ontario, the requirement that a jury be representative, the representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries, and the jury selection experience in other jurisdictions with significant Aboriginal populations.

B. BRIEF HISTORY OF JURIES IN ONTARIO

1. ROLE AND FUNCTIONS OF THE JURY

73. The jury as an institution has a long and distinguished history. References to jury-like bodies can be found in the history and mythology of early civilizations, including those of Egypt, Greece, and Scandinavia. One of the earliest recorded jury-like bodies was established by the Greek King Solon around the end of the seventh century B.C.E. King Solon established two courts, which were presided over by a general assembly of Athenian citizens, called the dikasteria. Service on the dikasteria was open to any Athenian citizen aged 30 or over “who was not indebted to the state and whose civil rights had not been forfeited.” This body held the power of appeal over civil and criminal matters, and, in performing this function, determined questions of fact and law, and voted in secret. Its judgments were not subject to appeal. The Athenian jury was transplanted to Rome around 451 to 450 B.C.E., and there is evidence that Rome brought the jury system to the territories it conquered.

74. The jury system as we know it in Ontario evolved in Britain. According to nineteenth century British historian, William Forsyth, trial by jury was unknown in the British Isles before the Norman Conquest in 1066 C.E. Following the Norman Conquest, there are several recorded instances of individuals being gathered to conduct inquests and make determinations on questions of fact and law. For example, William the Conqueror summoned juries in each county to make determinations as to the “value and manner of holdings of all property within the country.” The jury that we know today emerged gradually under a series of kings following William, who empanelled juries to resolve disputes between the royal treasury and religious bodies over land ownership, and to determine guilt or innocence in criminal and civil matters. The passage of the Magna Carta in 1215 by King John is credited by some as guaranteeing the right to trial by jury in Great Britain. In 1275, trial by jury became mandatory in criminal proceedings. in Great Britain. Many of the characteristics of modern juries emerged in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, including the right of the accused to challenge the composition of his or her jury panel, the use of juries to decide questions of fact (and not law), and the ability of juries to reach their own decision on the facts, rather than the decision demanded by the court.

75. The last point is particularly relevant given the importance attributed today to the independence of the jury. Prior to the seventeenth century, jurors could be punished by the court for reaching the “wrong verdict” (doing so was considered perjury – lying to the court). One of the most famous cases putting an end to this practice was the 1670 decision of Bushell’s Case. In Bushell’s Case, four jurors refused to convict two Quakers (a religious group) of “seditious preaching before an unlawful assembly.” At that time, any religious gathering outside of the Church of England was deemed unlawful, and that law was frequently used to repress the Quakers. The judge accepted the jurors’ verdict of not guilty, but fined the jurors for reaching a verdict that was “contrary to the evidence and contrary to his instructions.” When the jurors refused to pay, they were imprisoned. Lord Vaughn, a judge at the Court of Common Pleas, overturned this decision, and, in so doing, emphasized that “unless the jury can act independently of the judge, it cannot command public support.”

76. While we are separated by centuries from these foundational moments in the history of the jury, the developments in Bushell’s Case and others are still reflected in the modern rationales for the jury system, which, as the Supreme Court of Canada has stated, are “as compelling today as they were centuries ago”. In its comprehensive 1980 examination of the jury system in Canada, the Law Reform Commission of Canada set out five major functions of the jury in modern criminal proceedings: (1) the jury is a fact-finder; (2) the jury acts as the conscience of the community in criminal proceedings; (3) the jury is the ultimate protection against oppressive laws and the oppressive enforcement of the law; (4) the jury is an educational institution; and (5) the jury helps to legitimize the criminal justice system. These statements were adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Sherratt; the Court’s major decision on the importance of a representative jury, and, in so doing, emphasized that “unless the jury can act independently of the judge, it cannot command public support.”

77. Similar roles are played by the jury in a coroner’s inquest. As discussed in more detail at paragraphs 85 to 89, the coroner system in Ontario was received with the rest of the common law from England in the mid-nineteenth century. Prior to a series of late-nineteenth century reforms in England, which took place well after the institution of the coroner was received in Ontario, coroner’s inquests were responsible for indicting people for homicide and committing accused persons to trial. After a series of reforms in England, the focus of the Office of the Coroner shifted to investigating causes of death, rather than committing accused persons to trial.

and twentieth centuries, and the use of coroner’s inquests as a way of securing an indictment became obsolete. Despite these changes, the jury remained “an essential component” of the modern inquest. In performing its fact-finding role, the jury in a coroner’s inquest, unlike in criminal or civil proceedings, does not make a finding of guilt or liability. Rather, it is called upon to decide a series of questions related to the death and to make recommendations as to how such deaths may be prevented in the future.

78. Many of the early rationales for the jury continue to inform our use of the institution today, while at the same time, other, more modern, rationales have developed. It is revealing that this institution, or others like it, has been used across human history in civilizations with little or no ties to one another, reflecting the broad appeal of an institution that enables members of the community to play a central role in the administration of justice.

79. However, in spite of the importance and longevity of the jury as an institution of justice, it is important to recall that, from the perspective of Aboriginal peoples in Canada, it has often been regarded as an instrument of injustice. Indeed, criminal jury trials in Canada were used at times as a tool to punish, what the British viewed as, disloyal behavior on the part of Aboriginal people, and to persecute the customary practices of First Nations on the grounds that they constituted criminal behaviour.

80. A notable example occurred in the aftermath of the 1885 Northwest Rebellion – an act of resistance and protest initiated by Métis and Cree leaders in Western Canada. Once the Rebellion came to an end, and charges were laid against the Aboriginal participants, juries, comprised of settlers who were incensed with the Métis and Cree for causing the Rebellion, tried and convicted a number of prominent leaders and their people of various criminal offences. The Métis leader, Louis Riel, was charged with high treason and convicted by a jury of six English and Scottish Protestants after only 30 minutes of deliberations. Riel was sentenced to death by hanging. Three Cree Chiefs – Chief Poundmaker, Chief Big Bear, and Chief One Arrow – along with eight other Cree men were tried for murder and found guilty by a jury of non-Aboriginal people after only 15 minutes of deliberations. Eight of the Cree men were sentenced to death by hanging and the three Chiefs were sentenced to three years in prison. Despite the Native casualties during the Rebellion, not one non-Native person was tried for the killing of Métis and Cree warriors. A priest wrote to the Archbishop criticizing the juries, “The jurymen are all Protestants, enemies of the Métis and the Indians, against whom they maintain bitter prejudices.”

81. During the engagement process for the Independent Review, I heard firsthand of the 1907 prosecution of two medicine men from the Sandy Lake First Nation in Northwestern Ontario for a customary act that was fundamentally incongruent with Canadian societal values of criminality. Jack and Joseph Fiddler were charged with the murder of a young woman who was possessed with what was known by the Anishinawbe as a “wendigo” or evil spirit that would bring harm and danger to the community. The two respected medicine men were asked by the family to perform this task and accordingly claimed to be acting in accordance with their customary roles and responsibilities. They were arrested by the Northwest Mounted Police, charged with murder and brought to Norway House in Manitoba, the location of a Hudson Bay Trading Post, for trial. Apparently, this was the first time the Fiddler brothers, who did not speak English, left their community and were brought into contact with non-Aboriginal people and the justice system. One brother, Jack Fiddler, took his own life before trial. Joseph Fiddler faced a completely foreign system without the aid of legal counsel. He was tried by a judge, who was a Commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police involved in the original investigation, a lawyer from Winnipeg assigned to act as Crown Counsel, and a jury of six men from 29 Sherratt, supra note 21.

Norway House. Joseph Fiddler was convicted of the crime and initially sentenced to death, which was later reduced to life in prison. Being an elderly and sick man, Joseph Fiddler died soon afterwards in custody.

82. According to historians who have examined this trial, it was intended to serve as a signal to other First Nations that "wendigo" killings were not tolerable and such behavior would be punished. However, in so doing, it forever scarred the First Nations perception of the criminal justice system, particularly among members of the Sandy Lake First Nation, and contributes to their aversion to participate in it.

83. The relationship between the Canadian justice system and Canada's Aboriginal peoples continues to be troubled. A glaring example of these problems was revealed in the Report of the Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr., Prosecution. Although Donald Marshall, Jr., who was wrongfully convicted of murder and served 12 years in prison, did not elect to have a trial by jury, the utter failure of the criminal justice system as administered by the police, investigators, lawyers, Attorney General, and courts drew national attention to the issue of systemic discrimination in the justice system. The Royal Commission found that the miscarriage of justice in his case was directly attributable to the fact that Donald Marshall Jr. was a Mi'kmaq person. Given what I have heard while conducting the Independent Review, I unfortunately expect that a disturbing number of First Nations people in Ontario can relate to the circumstances endured by Donald Marshall, Jr.

84. I have mentioned the examples from Riel, Fiddler, and Marshall to illustrate the stains of mistreatment and injustice that to this day continue to influence the attitudes of First Nations people towards the Canadian justice system.

2. A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE JURY SYSTEM AND THE JURY SELECTION PROCESS IN ONTARIO

85. Juries have been used in criminal proceedings in Ontario since 1763, in civil proceedings since 1792, and in coroner’s inquests since at least 1763. Prior to 1763, what is now Canada was, at least from the perspective of non-Aboriginal settlers and the European powers, a French colony governed by the law of France. During that period, trial by jury in criminal and civil proceedings does not appear to have been commonplace. Following the French defeat by the British in the Seven Years’ War, France and Britain signed the Treaty of Paris in 1763, which ceded territory in Canada claimed by France to the British. That same year, King George III of England signed the Royal Proclamation of 1763. The Royal Proclamation stipulated that private law in Canada – the law of contracts, family law, estates and successions, among other things – remained the French civil law, but English law was adopted for the administration of criminal justice.

As a result, the jury and the Office of the Coroner were introduced into Canadian criminal law.

86. In 1791, Upper Canada (now Ontario) was divided from Lower Canada (now Quebec) as a result of the Constitutional Act, 1791, and, in that year, Upper Canada received its own constitution. These changes introduced the English jury system in its entirety to Upper Canada; juries in criminal proceedings were already commonplace, and they were introduced in civil proceedings by the 1792 Act to Establish Trials by Jury. The language of this Act demonstrates the high regard in which the institution of the jury was held:

Whereas trial by jury has been long established and approved in our mother country, and is one of the chief benefits to be attained by a free constitution, be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly of the province of Upper Canada, [...] all and every issue and issues of fact, which shall be joined in any action, real, personal, or mixed, and brought in any of his Majesty's courts of justice within the province aforesaid, shall be tried and determined by a unanimous verdict of twelve jurors, duly sworn for the trial of such issue or issues, which jurors shall be summoned and taken conformably to the law and custom of England.37

87. In line with these reforms, the Upper Canada Legislature established the Court of King's Bench (now the Superior Court) to hear criminal cases and certain civil cases, and other courts to hear the remainder of the civil cases.38 Juries were used in all of these courts.39 While they have since fallen out of use in all Canadian provinces, grand juries were also used to assess evidence adduced to determine whether a criminal indictment was appropriate.40

88. The Office of the Coroner was transplanted into Canada with the introduction of English criminal law.41 It seems probable that early coroner's inquests employed juries, since this practice was common in England.42 The first formal legislative enactment governing the Office of the Coroner in Upper Canada was the 1850 Act to amend the Law respecting the office of the Coroner.43 The 1850 Act permitted the coroner to summon a jury for inquests into deaths by violent or negligent means and required that a jury be summoned for inquests into the deaths of individuals who died while in custody (this requirement remains the case today).44 The law respecting coroner’s inquests has since been modernized and the Office of the Coroner enhanced in various ways,45 but the role of the jury (now a five-person jury) remains a fundamental part of every inquest.

89. The process for selecting jurors for trials was a highly contentious political issue in pre-Confederation Canada that first served as a catalyst for widespread reforms to the jury system, and subsequently contributed to the relative decline in the use of the jury. The Act to Establish Trials by Jury provided that "jurors shall be summoned and taken conformably to the law and custom of England". However, the selection process for comparatively densely populated late eighteenth and early nineteenth century England did not translate well to sparsely populated Upper Canada. In late eighteenth century England, constables were responsible for identifying men who met the requisite property requirements for jury service. Constables would post jurors lists on the local church door for three weeks, to allow people to identify any errors or omissions.46 Subsequently, these lists were certified by a local justice and the names were transcribed into a jurors' book, from which prospective jurors were drawn. Since this process transferred poorly into Upper Canada, the legislature passed the Act for the Regulation of Juries in 1794, which provided that every year the clerk of the peace in each district would compose a list of prospective jurors (all male householders) and provide it to the sheriff.47 From this list, the sheriff would select 36 to 48 names before a trial, from which 12 were randomly selected for jury service. Often, as discussed in the next section of this Report, the sheriff simply chose people living in the same neighborhood to reduce the costs associated with summoning jurors.

90. This system generated considerable controversy, as critics expressed concern that sheriffs were abusing their position by packing juries to ensure specific outcomes in trials. Between 1800 and 1850, there were increasing calls to strip the sheriff of his power to appoint jury panels.48 In the aftermath of the 1837 Rebellions, for example, there was widespread belief that government officials had packed juries to ensure the convictions of accused rebels. The drive towards reform culminated in 1850 with the passage of the Upper Canada Jurors’ Act of 1850.49 The 1850 Act introduced significant changes to the jury system, including a complex system for juror selection that involved a local “committee of selectors” in each township, which created lists of prospective jurors that were forwarded to the clerk of the peace, and subsequently to the sheriff for juror selection.50 While the 1850 Act was effective in ending claims of packed juries, it significantly increased the costs of the jury system, which – as will be discussed in the next part of this section – was a major reason for the jury’s decline in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

91. The increased costs of the jury system as a result of the 1850 Act, as well as general citizen dissatisfaction about the inconvenience of serving on juries, once again spurred reform efforts. A series of failed jury reform bills following the enactment of the 1850 Act eventually culminated in the passage in 1879 of An Act to Amend the Jurors Act.51 This Act simplified juror eligibility by setting the minimum property requirements at $600 or more for people living in cities, and $400 or more for people living in towns and villages.52 These property requirements were to remain in place until 1972. The proponents of this Act rejected using the voters’ list as a basis for selecting possible jurors because, in their view, “there are many on the voters’ list who would be anything but satisfactory jurymen.”53 The 1879 Act also simplified the process for juror selection in order to reduce costs.

3. DECLINE IN THE USE OF JURIES FROM THE NINETEENTH TO THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

92. The late-nineteenth century marked the beginning of a decline in the use of juries in Ontario. In addition to the reasons already discussed – high costs and inconvenience – one author attributes the decline to the entrenchment of responsible government.54 Juries had served as a bulwark against oppressive laws and oppressive government. However, the establishment of democratically elected legislative assemblies in the provinces of Canada helped to assuage fears of tyrannical government and undermine this rationale for the use of juries.

93. The decline in the use of juries was especially apparent in civil proceedings. Prior to the 1860s, in civil proceedings, trial by jury was the only form of trial recognized by the Courts of common law.55 In 1868, the presumption that civil trials were to be tried by a jury was reversed after the Ontario legislature passed the Law Reform Act of 1868.56 Following passage of that Act, civil actions were tried before a jury only when it was requested by one of the parties. Five years later, the Ontario legislature passed the 1873 Act for the better administration of Justice in the Courts of Ontario.57 This Act required the permission of a judge for a jury to be called for all but a select number of civil causes of action, including libel and malicious prosecution. However, the parties could still choose to waive the jury for a trial involving one of those causes of action.\textsuperscript{58} Since then, not only has the use of the jury declined, but there have also been calls for its abolition in civil proceedings. For instance, in 1968 the Ontario Royal Commission Inquiry into Civil Rights recommended that civil juries be abolished altogether except in defamation cases: “the conclusion we have come to is that the trial of civil cases by a jury is a procedure that has outlived its usefulness in Ontario.”\textsuperscript{59} However, when the Ontario Law Reform Commission examined this issue in 1994, it concluded that civil juries are appropriate in certain cases and therefore should remain available.\textsuperscript{60}

94. Currently, civil juries are available in principle for all but a small range of actions, including actions for an injunction, equitable relief, or relief against a municipality.\textsuperscript{61} Before proceeding to trial, the parties to a civil action can elect a trial by jury under the \textit{Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure}.\textsuperscript{62} In practice however, civil juries are rarely used outside of a narrow range of actions, including defamation.

95. The use of jury trials also declined in criminal proceedings, though not as precipitously as in civil proceedings. This decline was largely attributable to a series of laws passed by the Upper Canada Legislature and, following Confederation, by the Parliament of Canada. The Upper Canada Legislature enacted a law in 1834 which provided that certain types of offences, such as minor assaults and some crimes against the property of another, could be tried by a justice of the peace sitting without a jury.\textsuperscript{63} In 1869, the newly constituted Parliament of Canada passed the \textit{Speedy Trials Act}, which broadened the scope of offences that could be tried before a judge alone if the accused consented.\textsuperscript{64} Parliament passed the first \textit{Criminal Code} in 1892, which applied in all parts of the country. Under the \textit{Criminal Code}, trial before a judge and jury was necessary for the most serious offences, including treason and murder.\textsuperscript{65} However, certain other types of offences, such as assault or theft below a certain value, were triable by way of summary trial before a judge sitting alone if the accused so elected.\textsuperscript{66} Similarly, young offenders could elect to be tried by a jury or a judge sitting alone.\textsuperscript{67} The 1892 \textit{Criminal Code} remains the basis for modern criminal law, and, consequently, many of the provisions it made for trial by jury remain (with some changes) today. In 1980, the Law Reform Commission of Canada recommended keeping the criminal jury, since “it performs a number of valuable functions in the criminal justice system”, as I have discussed above.\textsuperscript{68}

96. Currently, the rights of an accused to be tried by a jury are governed by the \textit{Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms} and the \textit{Criminal Code}. Under Charter section 11(f), any person charged with an offence has the right “except in the case of an offence under military law tried before a military tribunal, to the benefit of trial by jury where the maximum punishment for the offence is imprisonment for five years or a more severe punishment”. As a result, at a minimum, those facing five or more years imprisonment are guaranteed the right to a trial by jury. The \textit{Criminal Code} divides offences into three types: indictable offences, summary conviction offences, and hybrid offences.\textsuperscript{69} Indictable offences include “the most serious crimes”, such as murder and treason.\textsuperscript{70} As a general rule, these offences must be tried by a judge and jury unless both the accused and the Attorney General consent to a trial before a judge alone.\textsuperscript{71} Summary offences, such as impaired driving, carry maximum penalties of six months in prison and fines of up to $5000, and are tried before a judge alone.\textsuperscript{72} There is no right to a jury for a summary conviction trial.\textsuperscript{73} Finally, hybrid crimes, such as assault, fraud, and drug offences can be tried as indictments or summary offences, and the decision to proceed as one or the other is solely at the discretion of the Attorney General. If the Attorney General chooses to proceed by way of indictment, the accused can opt to be tried by a jury.\textsuperscript{74}

97. The jury is still an important part of our criminal justice system. According to a 2011 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news story, of the more than 600,000 criminal charges laid in Ontario between April 1, 2009 and March 31, 2010, 513 criminal indictments were disposed of by a judge and jury, as opposed to 340 by a judge sitting alone.\textsuperscript{75} However, many of the issues affecting juries during the nineteenth century that I have briefly considered remain live issues today. For instance, the burden and inconvenience of serving on juries was recently highlighted in the same CBC story. In Ontario, jurors are paid nothing for the first ten days of a trial, $40 for everyday thereafter up to the fiftieth day of trial, and $100 a day thereafter. This lack of payment, among other difficulties, is contributing to an increase in the number of individuals who do not attend at court after being summoned.

\section*{C. THE JURY SELECTION SYSTEM AS IT CURRENTLY OPERATES IN ONTARIO}

98. The machinery of the jury system in Ontario today is governed by the 1990 \textit{Juries Act} (attached as Appendix B to the Report), which sets out the process for establishing jury rolls in the province's judicial districts.\textsuperscript{76} Under that Act, the sheriff in each county and the Director of Assessment are responsible for compiling an annual jurors list, though in practice the sheriff's responsibilities have been delegated to the Provincial Jury Center (PJC) in London, Ontario and to local court officials.

99. During the spring of each year, we understand that the Court Services staff at each local Ontario Superior Court, in consultation with local judges, provide an estimate to the Provincial Jury Center of the number of jurors that will be required for all jury trials in the upcoming year. Once the required number has been determined, the Provincial Jury Centre informs the Municipal Property Assessment Corporation (MPAC) of the number of jurors that will be required. MPAC selects names at random from the list of municipal residents within each county and district, and forwards these names to a third party which is responsible for sending out jury questionnaires. As discussed at paragraph 41 of the Report, section 6(8) of the \textit{Juries Act} requires the names of individuals living in First Nations communities to be acquired using any available record, since their names are not contained in MPAC record.

\textsuperscript{71} Ibid., Criminal Code at c. C-46, s. 473(1). \textsuperscript{72} Ibid., c. J. 3. See Henry A. Wilkins, \textit{Ontario Juries: Essays in Law, History, and Politics} (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2010). The confusing use of the terms “jury districts” and “jury areas” is discussed at paragraph 118 of the Report. There seems to be confusion as to the delineation of jury districts, and the terminology used. Section 5(2) of the \textit{Juries Act} addresses “territorial districts”, while s. 10 of Regulation 680 under the \textit{Juries Act} establishes two “jury areas,” but does not identify the rest of the province’s jury areas. It is regrettable that there is no publically available source of information identifying Ontario’s jury districts or areas, or providing a map thereof. This lack of transparency seems to give rise to confusion, and warrants clarification.
100. Questionnaires are sent to all persons identified by MPAC, who after receiving a questionnaire must complete and return it within five days. The Ministry of Finance, acting as an agent of the Provincial Jury Centre, compiles the names of eligible jurors based on the responses in the questionnaires and forwards this information to the Provincial Jury Centre. Using this information, the Provincial Jury Centre compiles the jury rolls for the upcoming year for each county or district in the province.77

101. Jury panels for trials are randomly selected from the jury rolls compiled by the Provincial Jury Centre for each Superior Court when the need so arises. The panel is a group of people from which the petit jury, meaning the jury who sits on a trial, will be selected. Those selected for the jury panel are issued a summons requiring them to attend at the court where the trial will take place for jury selection. In criminal proceedings, both the Crown and the defence are given the opportunity under the Criminal Code to challenge prospective jurors, meaning that either side can ask that certain jurors be excused. Either side can challenge an unlimited number of prospective jurors “for cause”, typically on the basis that the prospective juror will not be “indifferent between the Queen and the accused”.78 Depending on the type of crime being tried, both sides are also given between four and 20 “peremptory challenges”, meaning that the prospective juror can be asked to stand aside without providing a reason.79 Prospective jurors can also ask to stand aside on the basis of illness or that service will impose on them an undue hardship. When this process is complete, a group of 12 jurors will remain to serve on the petit jury. The parties to a civil proceeding select jurors in a similar manner, except only six jurors are chosen to serve on the petit jury.80

102. Juries for coroner’s inquests are also selected from the jury roll prepared by the Provincial Jury Centre. When the coroner begins an inquest, he or she issues a warrant that requires the Provincial Jury Centre to provide a list of jurors living in the area where the death occurred. The Coroner’s Constable then selects the names of people whom he or she believes to be “suitable to serve as jurors at an inquest” from that list and issues summonses requiring them to attend at the place of inquest.81 As in the case of criminal or civil proceedings, prospective jurors may be dismissed if serving would cause undue hardship or if there is reason to believe that, because of bias, they may not be able to reach a verdict based on the evidence. From the group of prospective jurors, five are chosen to serve on the inquest.

103. Jury selection for coroner’s inquests does not emphasize randomness in the same way as jury selection for civil or criminal trials. The role of a jury in a coroner’s inquest is to make recommendations based on the evidence presented to them, not to make a finding of guilt or liability. In fact, coroner’s juries are prohibited from making findings of legal responsibility. As a result, the imperative existing in criminal trials in particular that emphasizes trial fairness through a representative jury is not present in a coroner’s inquest. Of course, the jury role from which prospective jurors are drawn has to be representative; as I described in paragraph 51 above, the coroner suspended the Bushie Inquest after it was determined that the jury roll was not representative. However, often the members of a coroner’s jury are selected from the area where the death took place, since people who reside in that area may be better able to make recommendations tailored to local needs and conditions.

D. REQUIREMENT THAT A JURY BE REPRESENTATIVE

104. The requirement that a jury be representative is a bedrock principle governing the formation of the modern jury. As Madam Justice L’Heureux-Dube, writing for a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in the 1991 R. v. Sherratt case, stated, the modern jury “was envisioned as a representative cross-section of society, honestly and fairly chosen.” My mandate as Independent Reviewer is not to determine whether the jury roll as it applies to First Nations communities is representative as a matter of law; that issue has been and continues to be dealt with before the courts and other bodies. But I believe it is important, nevertheless, for me to outline the background to and some of the case law respecting representativeness as part of the context for the recommendations in my Report.

1. HISTORY AND EVOLUTION OF THE PRINCIPLE OF A REPRESENTATIVE JURY

105. The principle that a jury must be representative of a fair cross-section of the community is a relatively recent one in North America. Historically, jury service in Ontario was limited to men who owned property. The property requirement for jury service was rooted in the history of the jury in the United Kingdom, which required, for example, during the sixteenth century that jurors own a freehold with a certain minimum value in the county where the crime took place. The property requirements for jury service in Ontario were strict; only men owning houses or land with a minimum rateable value were called to serve on juries, likely resulting in the jury pool being limited to the wealthiest among an already narrow pool of eligible citizens. The 1877 Jurors Act provided, for example, that the jury roll would be established by compiling a list from the property assessment roll “commencing with the name of the person rated at the highest amount on such roll and proceeding successively towards the name of the person rated at the lowest amount, until the names of one half of the persons assessed upon such roll have been copied from the same.”

106. The already small pool of potential jurors in Ontario was further narrowed by the selection process. Often, the sheriff selected jurors from a single neighborhood to minimize the costs associated with summoning prospective jurors. Consequently, jury membership was decidedly unrepresentative. Juries were frequently composed of members of the upper class selected from the same neighborhood, who sat in judgment of those charged with criminal offences.

107. Minimum property requirements as a condition for jury eligibility remained the rule in Ontario until 1972. Following changes in 1972, eligibility for jury duty was determined by whether a person was listed on the most recent polling list registered under the Municipal Elections Act. A year later in 1973 this system for determining eligibility was changed, and all Canadians citizens aged eighteen to sixty-nine years became eligible to serve on a jury. That same year, the Juries Act was amended to require the sheriff to include the names of members of First Nation communities on the jury roll by obtaining those names “from any record available” – a provision now included in section 6(8) of the Juries Act, discussed in more detail in subsequent parts of the Report.

108. The principle of a constitutional right to a representative jury emerged in United States jurisprudence long before it developed in Ontario or anywhere else in Canada. Historically, African-Americans were excluded from the jury source lists of many states, especially in the South. While in Canada the issue of jury representativeness was not dealt with extensively by the courts until the enactment of the Charter, the United States Supreme Court played an important role in that country in developing the safeguards guaranteeing a representative jury. The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides the right to be tried... by “an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed”. The phrase has been interpreted by the Supreme Court as guaranteeing the right to a representative jury, and the Court has used it to strike down laws and practices that were aimed at excluding African-Americans from the jury pool.

109. The first Supreme Court decision addressing this issue was Strauder v. West Virginia (1880). In Strauder, the accused, an African-American, was tried and convicted – by an all-white jury – of murdering his wife. At the time, West Virginia law prohibited African-Americans from serving on juries in the state. In its decision, the Supreme Court invalidated the West Virginia law on the basis that it violated the right of African-American defendants to the equal protection of the law. The decision in Strauder, as two commentators have noted, “effectively (if indirectly) recognized the right of African-Americans to serve on juries.” However, it did not end the matter, and the extent to which African-Americans were excluded from juries varied across the country. Southern jurisdictions continued to exclude African-Americans from juries for decades to come; however, these practices were gradually eliminated through a series of important Supreme Court decisions, discussed below.

110. In 1935, the Supreme Court released two seminal decisions overturning the convictions of African-American men by different all-white juries in Alabama, where African-Americans were systematically excluded from jury service. These cases were heard concurrently and involved nine African-American men who were accused of raping two white women. These men were commonly referred to as the Scottsboro Boys. The first case, Norris v. Alabama (1935), set the precedent that excluding African-Americans from the jury source list violated the constitutional right of an African-American accused of a crime to the equal protection of the law. In that case, one of the Scottsboro Boys had been convicted by an all-white jury. The conviction was appealed and was overturned by the United State Supreme Court. The Court held that the exclusion of African-Americans from the jury source list in Alabama implied to the Court that discrimination existed, and this exclusion provided a sufficient basis for overturning the conviction. The second case was Patterson v. Alabama (1935), where the Court followed its decision in Norris and set aside the convictions of two more of the Scottsboro Boys who had also been convicted by an all-white jury.

111. Since these decisions, the United States Supreme Court has interpreted the Sixth Amendment in ways that have strengthened the right to a representative jury. In Thiel v. Southern Pac Co. (1946) the Court interpreted this constitutional guarantee as requiring that the jury be “chosen from a representative cross-section of the community”. The Court has since developed two standards for testing the representativeness of juror lists: the equal protection standard and the fair cross-section standard. The equal protection standard forbids the exclusion of individuals from jury source lists on the basis of intentional discrimination, as well as any measures that are “susceptible to being used to exclude” groups of persons from the jury list. The fair cross-section standard guarantees all those charged with an offence the right to a representative jury source list. Moreover, in 1968 the Supreme Court decided in Duncan v. Louisiana that the Sixth Amendment, which the Court has found to protect (among other things) the right to a representative jury, extends to state and federal criminal trials.

112. Outright discrimination against African-Americans and other minorities was not the only means used to exclude them from jury source lists. In many states, prospective jurors were selected using a ‘key man’ system. The ‘key man’ was a prominent member of the community, such as a minister or a local banker, who was responsible for submitting lists of prospective jurors to the jury commissioner. The commissioner would then compile a list of prospective jurors based on the names provided by the ‘key man’. However, the difficulties of ensuring a representative jury using the key man system are apparent; the selection of prospective jurors was subject to the beliefs and biases of the key men, who would often “draw upon their limited circle of acquaintances” in selecting potential jurors.

113. It was widely acknowledged and recognized by Congress that the ‘key man’ system resulted in the underrepresentation of minorities on juries. In response to the ‘key man’ system, and to create a fairer way to select people for federal jury source lists, the United States Congress in 1968 enacted the United States Jury Selection and Service Act (JSSA). The stated policy of the JSSA is that “all litigants in federal courts entitled to trial by jury shall have the right to grand and petit juries selected at random from a fair cross section of the community.” Under the JSSA, jurors for trials in federal courts are selected from voters lists, though the courts are given the discretion to supplement this source with others if it is determined that the voters list is unrepresentative. This legislation was an important step forward in promoting jury representativeness in the United States. However, the JSSA applies only to the composition of jury source lists for federal courts, not state courts. The ‘key man’ system has not been declared unconstitutional, and it appears as though it is still used in some states to select the jurors for trials before state courts. Moreover, there is evidence that African-American underrepresentation on voters lists and the unavailability of residence lists from predominantly African-American districts means that African-Americans continue to be under-represented in federal jury trials.

114. In Canada, as I noted above, the importance of a representative jury was not recognized as a constitutional principle until after the enactment of the Charter in 1982. However, in its 1980 working paper described at paragraph 76 above, the Law Reform Commission of Canada stated that “the functions assigned to the jury presuppose that jurors are selected at random from a fair cross-section of the community.” Consequently, “if a representative jury is to be empanelled, the categories of people who are disqualified from jury service must be kept at a minimum.” The Law Reform Commission recommended the following as the only reasonable disqualifications from jury service: not having Canadian citizenship, not having attained the age 18 years or over, not an ordinary resident in the judicial district, lack of fluency in the language of the accused, a mental or physical disability, conviction of a criminal offence, and certain occupational disqualifications.

115. In its 1991 R. v. Sherratt decision, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized the requirement of a representative jury as a constitutional principle. In her reasons for the majority in that case, Madam Justice L’Heureux-Dube linked the principles of representativeness and impartiality to the s. 11(f) Charter right to be tried by a jury and the s. 11(d) Charter right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal. As she stated, [T]he Charter right to jury trial is meaningless without some guarantee that it will perform its duties impartially and represent, as far as is possible and appropriate in the circumstances, the larger community. Indeed, without the two characteristics of impartiality and representativeness, a jury would be unable to perform many of the functions that make its existence desirable in the first place.

116. In addition to protecting the rights of the accused, the representativeness of juries has broader implications for society’s perception of the criminal justice system. Impartial and representative juries play an important function in maintaining public confidence in the legal system. The public is more likely to perceive trials, and by extension the legal system as a whole, as being fair if prospective jurors are representative of the wider community from which they are drawn. Conversely, the wholesale exclusion of particular groups from the jury pool risks undermining public acceptance of the fairness of the criminal justice system. A jury cannot act as the conscience of the community unless it is viewed favorably by the society that it serves.

2. ONTARIO CASE LAW ON REPRESENTATIVENESS

117. As I discussed above in Part II,A, the Independent Review arose in large part from a series of recent cases – Pierre v. McRae and the Kokopenace and Spiers appeals – dealing with the representativeness of jury rolls as they relate to members of First Nation communities. In this section, I briefly discuss some other Ontario cases that deal with the issue of representativeness. These cases have arisen in two different contexts: the preparation of jury rolls and the selection of individuals to serve on the jury.

(A) PREPARATION OF JURY ROLLS

118. In R. v. Church of Scientology et al. (1997), the Ontario Court of Appeal refused to find that limiting prospective jurors to Canadian citizens results in an unrepresentative jury. In that case, the accused, who was a non-citizen convicted of various offences, sought to have a mistrial declared on the basis that the exclusion of non-citizens from jury rolls resulted in a jury that was unrepresentative. The trial judge agreed that the exclusion of non-citizens resulted in an unrepresentative jury roll, but the Court of Appeal overturned this decision. The Court acknowledged that a representative jury is important to ensure that certain viewpoints and beliefs are not systematically excluded from the jury pool. However, the Court found that non-citizens do not share any common characteristics that are relevant to the underlying reason for ensuring that jury rolls are representative.

119. Similarly, in R. v. Laws (1998), the Ontario Court of Appeal found that the citizenship requirement for inclusion on the jury roll did not result in unrepresentative juries by precluding large numbers of black permanent residents who are not citizens from potential jury service. The accused in this case was black and was charged with illegally smuggling individuals into Canada and the United States. He argued that a mistrial should be declared because the citizenship requirement for jury service resulted in large numbers of black permanent residents being excluded, raising the possibility that the jury roll was unrepresentative. The Court of Appeal disagreed; it found that the defendant could not establish that marginally increasing the number of black people on jury rolls by eliminating the citizenship requirement for jury service would result in a material increase in the possibility of a black individual being selected to serve on the jury for a black person charged with an offence. However, this holding does not preclude the opposite finding in another case with substantially different demographics.

120. In R. v. Nahdee (1993), the Ontario Court of Justice declared a mistrial after it became clear that the sheriff of Lambton County had failed to make sufficient efforts to ensure that First Nations peoples were represented on jury rolls.109 The defendant was charged with attempted murder, but subsequently sought a mistrial on the basis that the sheriff failed to secure the names of First Nations individuals for possible inclusion on jury rolls. The sheriff had contacted band leadership on First Nations reserves in his district in order to secure the names of the reserve’s inhabitants for jury questionnaire mailing. However, the band leadership failed to reply to the sheriff’s request, and the sheriff took no further actions to gather the names of reserve residents. The Court found that the sheriff failed in his duty under the Juries Act to actively seek out the names of First Nations individuals living on reserves for possible inclusion on the jury rolls. His failure to do so resulted in an unrepresentative jury roll, which warranted the finding of a mistrial.

121. In a 1994 follow-up trial involving the defendant from R. v. Nahdee,110 the defendant was again convicted of attempted murder, but sought to have the conviction set aside on the basis that the jury roll was unrepresentative. The Ontario Court of Justice found that in 1994, the sheriff had made greater efforts to place the names of First Nations individuals in Lambton County on the jury roll by sending out and receiving responses from a larger number of jury questionnaires. As a result, the names of First Nations people living on reserves were inscribed on the jury roll, and there was a possibility that First Nations individuals would be chosen to serve on jury panels.

122. R. v. Ransley (1993) followed on the heels of the defendant’s success in having a mistrial declared in R. v. Nahdee.111 In Ransley, the defendant challenged the jury panel composed for his trial alleging that the jury roll was unrepresentative because the sheriff did not follow a specified procedure for adding First Nations individuals to the roll and also sent a disproportionately large number of questionnaires to the reserves in his jurisdiction because of the historically low response rates. The Ontario Court of Justice denied the defendant’s challenge to the composition of the jury panel. The Court found that the process followed by the sheriff, while imperfect, represented a good faith attempt to secure the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll.

(B) SELECTION OF THE JURY PANEL

123. As already noted, the foundational case elevating the principle of a representative jury to a constitutional imperative was the Supreme Court’s decision in Sherratt.112 In that case, the accused sought to have all prospective jurors dismissed on the basis that they were not impartial as between the Crown and the accused. The accused was charged with murder, and considerable media coverage surrounded the search for the deceased’s body ten months before the trial. The trial judge denied the defence’s request. However, he instructed all prospective jurors that they could not serve on the jury if they had seen, heard, or read anything that might render them not impartial as between the Crown and the accused. The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the trial judge’s decision but, as referred to in paragraph 115 above, made important statements about the constitutional requirement for juries to be impartial and representative.

124. In R. v. Bain (1992), the Supreme Court of Canada found that section 634 of the Criminal Code was unconstitutional because it allowed the Crown to challenge, without cause, four times more jurors than the defence, as the Crown’s ability to stand-aside 48 potential jurors far outstripped the defence’s right to peremptorily challenge them. The Court held that this could result in a jury that was perceived by society as partial towards the Crown, thereby tarring the entire trial with a taint of unfairness.

125. In R. v. Smoke (1983), the Ontario High Court of Justice found that the absence from the jury of First Nations individuals living on reserves in the jurisdiction where the crime took place did not constitute a violation of the defendant’s Charter rights. The defendant was charged with various counts of sexual assault, and all of the alleged offences took place on the reserve where he resided. He argued that he had a right to be tried on the reserve where he resided with a jury composed entirely of its residents. The Court disagreed; it found, that although there were no residents from reserves on the jury roll, First Nations individuals living off reserve were included. The Court found that First Nations individuals were as likely as non-First Nations individuals to be called to serve on a jury. The Court acknowledged that the presence of First Nations individuals living off reserve on the jury roll was different from having individuals who live on reserves on the jury roll; however, it did not believe that this distinction was serious enough to warrant providing the defendant with a remedy.

126. In R. v. Butler (1984), the British Columbia Court of Appeal found that a sheriff’s policy of intentionally excluding members of First Nations from jury panels resulted in an unrepresentative jury that warranted granting the defendant a mistrial. The Court noted that it is possible for a jury panel to contain no First Nations individuals. However, the “essential wrong” in this case was a deliberate policy on the part of the sheriff to exclude First Nations individuals altogether.

127. In Fiddler v. the Queen (1994), the defendant was charged with sexual assault and, before the trial began, argued that he had a constitutional right to be tried by a jury of his cultural peers to be randomly selected from the district where he resided. The then Ontario Court of Justice disagreed. While the Court recognized the importance of having people who share the defendant’s cultural affinity on the jury rolls, it decided that the cultural affinity of the accused cannot predominate, since such a narrow approach ignores the perspective of the complainant and ignores entirely the interests of the public. Indeed, a jury composed solely of members of the accused’s community would run counter to the value of maintaining a representative jury roll.

128. In R. v. A.F. (1993), the then Ontario Court of Justice found that holding a trial by jury outside of the defendant’s community did not infringe his Charter rights. The defendant, a resident of the Sandy Lake reserve, was accused of various sexual offences and elected a trial by jury. However, trials by jury were not available in Sandy Lake, and instead the trial was to be held in Kenora. The defendant argued that holding the trial in Kenora violated his Charter rights, since the jury would not be composed of members of his community. The Court disagreed; it wrote that for the purposes of jury selection, the notion of ‘community’ must be defined broadly if the jury is to satisfy its role as a democratic institution. A jury composed entirely of members of the defendant’s family and kin would run counter to the broader definition of community. Moreover, the Charter does not provide a right to be tried in a particular location or to be tried exclusively by the members of a particular group.

129. Finally, R. v. Wareham (#2) (2012) is, at the time of writing, the most recent judicial decision dealing with the issue of Aboriginal underrepresentation on jury rolls. The defendant in Wareham was charged with second degree murder. His trial had originally been set for 2011, but following the Ontario Court of Appeal’s decision in Pierre v. McRae, he successfully challenged his jury panel on the basis that it was not representative. In his 2012 trial, he once again attempted to challenge his jury panel on the basis that it was unrepresentative. The Superior Court denied his challenge. The Court found that, while the procedure in place for securing the representation of First Nations peoples on jury rolls was imperfect, good faith efforts were made to obtain the names of First Nations individuals living on reserve for inclusion on the jury roll. These efforts included contacting band chiefs and mailing jury questionnaires to large numbers of people living on reserve.

130. Certain general principles emerge from these cases. The principle of representativeness requires that jurors be selected at random from a pool whose composition is representative of Canadian society as a whole. In order to be representative, no group of Canadians can be systematically excluded. However, as I have stated above, no one has the right to have individuals from a particular group on their jury panel, or to be tried exclusively by members of a group to which they belong. Finally, illegality in the process for composing the jury, like the process for swearing in the jury, suffices to have a trial verdict set aside.

131. Having said all this with respect to the case law on representativeness, from a policy standpoint, I believe Ontario could enact procedures and approaches that go beyond the minimum legal standards that have been set by the jurisprudence, so long as what is proposed does not run afoul of the basic legal ingredients for having an impartial and representative jury.

E. THE REPRESENTATION OF FIRST NATIONS PEOPLES ON ONTARIO JURIES

1. INTRODUCTION

132. As the cases discussed above make clear, the issue of underrepresentation of members of First Nations communities on Ontario’s jury roll is a serious and persistent problem. The statistics that have emerged from the court cases about underrepresentation of First Nations communities in the large northern judicial districts of Ontario are particularly troubling.

133. In the judicial district of Kenora, for example, which makes up about one-third of Ontario’s land mass, it is estimated that approximately 30 to 36 per cent of the population live “on reserve” – in communities designated as reserves under the Indian Act or as “Indian Settlements” (non-reserve Crown land on which a community of Aboriginal persons resides more or less permanently). But, as described further below, these on-reserve residents typically make up less than ten percent of the Kenora jury roll. Similarly, in the judicial district of Thunder Bay, on-reserve residents in 2011 made up approximately five percent of the population but accounted for only 1.3 percent of the jury roll.

134. My task in this Review is to provide recommendations as to how we can begin to deal with this problem, which – as I have emphasized – is deep and systemic. But to provide the proper context to my recommendations, it is important first to understand the steps that have already been taken by provincial officials to attempt to create a jury roll that is properly representative of the members of First Nations.
communities. I do that in this section by describing the Juries Act obligation of court officials to include on-reserve residents on Ontario’s jury roll, the record as to the steps court officials have taken to attempt to fulfill that obligation, and the results of those efforts to date.

2. JURIES ACT OBLIGATION TO INCLUDE ON-RESERVE RESIDENTS ON ONTARIO’S JURY ROLL

135. As described at paragraph 99 above, the Juries Act specifies that the primary source of data for creating Ontario’s jury roll is the most recent municipal enumeration undertaken pursuant to the Assessment Act. But municipal enumeration does not capture residents of reserves designated under the Indian Act. The Juries Act therefore prescribes a separate process intended to provide for the proportionate inclusion of on-reserve residents in the jury roll. Section 6(8) of the Juries Act states:

6(8) In the selecting of persons for entry in the jury roll in a county or district in which an Indian reserve is situate, the sheriff shall select names of eligible persons inhabiting the reserve in the same manner as if the reserve were a municipality and, for the purpose, the sheriff may obtain the names of inhabitants of the reserve from any record available.\(^\text{124}\)

136. The sheriff’s obligation “to obtain the names of inhabitants of the reserve from any record available” is in fact carried out by various provincial officials who have either been assigned the powers of the sheriff or who act on the instruction of the holder of such assigned powers.\(^\text{125}\) Responsibility for fulfilling the obligations of section 6(8) is currently divided among:

(a) local judicial district or county court staff, who obtain the names of on-reserve inhabitants, select the individuals to receive questionnaires, and prepare and mail the questionnaires to on-reserve inhabitants;

(b) the Provincial Jury Centre, which receives and reviews the questionnaires returned and enters the eligible names in the jury roll; and

(c) the Director of Court Operations for the West Region, who carries out the sheriff’s responsibility to certify each jury roll to be the proper roll prepared as the law directs.\(^\text{126}\)

3. PRACTICE OF COURT OFFICIALS PRIOR TO 2001

137. The requirements currently found in section 6(8) of the Juries Act were first adopted in 1973, but it is not clear what records were relied on by Ontario officials at that time to fulfill those requirements. It appears that from at least the early 1990s on, Ontario officials began to rely substantially on lists maintained by Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC) of persons with registered Indian status affiliated with each First Nation in Ontario.\(^\text{127}\) These lists were obtained each year by the Provincial Jury Centre by way of a request to INAC under the federal Access to Information Act pursuant to a 1983 Ontario-Canada agreement allowing access to, and the use and disclosure of, personal information under the control of a federal government institution to Ontario for the purpose of administering or enforcing any law or carrying out a lawful investigation.\(^\text{128}\) Once obtained, the lists were distributed to local court offices, where they were used to fulfill the requirements of section 6(8), if the local court staff were unable to obtain a list directly from a First Nation, which was often the case.

\(^{125}\) See section 73(2) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O 1990, c. 43, as amended, which provides for any power or duty of the sheriff to be exercised or performed by a person to whom the power or duty has been assigned by the Deputy Attorney General or a person designated by the Deputy Attorney General.
138. It appears that in the 1990s, provincial officials received more completed jury questionnaires from on-reserve residents than is the case today. In his 1994 decision in R. v. Fiddler, for example, Mr. Justice Stach stated that the return rate for on-reserve residents was approximately 33 percent, far higher than the return rates in the Kenora judicial district over the last several years, which have been less than ten percent.\(^\text{129}\)

139. From at least the mid-1990s on, the Ministry of the Attorney General’s Court Services Division circulated to its staff a directive respecting the performance of the sheriff’s duties under section 6(8).\(^\text{130}\) This directive was distributed annually by the Provincial Jury Centre to local court staff as part of an annual communications package sent out to prompt the commencement of the section 6(8) work. The directive instructed local court staff to:

(a) ascertain, check, and confirm the reserves located in the county or district for which they were responsible;

(b) attempt to obtain the band electoral list, or any other accurate list of residents, by writing letters, telephoning, or visiting the reserves in the area for which they were responsible;

(c) calculate the number of on-reserve questionnaires to be sent, using a prescribed formula;

(d) perform a random selection of the required number of names from “the best possible list”, and prepare and mail the questionnaires to these persons; and

(e) provide interim and final reports to the Provincial Jury Centre at various points during this process.

140. That directive has now been replaced by instructions contained in a Jury Manual prepared by the Court Services Division, and is available to local court officials. Chapter 7 of the Jury Manual provides directions to local court officials as to how to comply with the requirements of section 6(8), restating and expanding on the instructions that had been provided in the directive.\(^\text{131}\)

4. PRACTICE OF COURT OFFICIALS FROM 2001 ON

141. In 2001, INAC advised the Ministry of the Attorney General’s Court Services Division that it was discontinuing its previous practice of providing lists to the Ministry. In its correspondence with the Ministry, INAC noted that federal privacy policies and practices regarding the release of this kind of personal information pursuant to the Privacy Act had changed since INAC initially began providing the lists.\(^\text{132}\) INAC stated that “[d]ue to the sensitive nature and variability of the information under INAC’s control, we have determined that this information cannot be released to you at this time.”\(^\text{133}\) INAC also noted in the letter that Ontario was the only province requesting this information from INAC for the purpose specified.\(^\text{134}\)

142. Following 2001, Ontario officials continued to rely on the 2000 INAC lists, despite the fact that they began to become out-dated, as well as any other lists they were able to obtain by writing to or otherwise contacting individual First Nations communities. In the late 2000s, it appears that local court officials learned for the first time that the response rates from questionnaires mailed to the on-reserve population were very low. For example, the court official responsible for carrying out the sheriff’s duties in the Kenora judicial district learned in 2007 that the rate of eligible returns (i.e., the number of returned questionnaires from individuals eligible for the jury roll) for questionnaires sent to on-reserve residents in 2006 (for the 2007 jury roll) was 7.6 percent compared to a rate of 56 percent for off-reserve residents.135

\(^{130}\) The 1996 version of this directive, which was filed in R. v. Kokopenace, is a memorandum dated June 25, 1996 from the Director of the Program Development Branch of the Ministry of the Attorney General Court Services Division. According to the evidence filed in Kokopenace, I understand that versions of this directive were distributed annually.

143. Upon learning about these dismal rates of return, Kenora district court officials began taking additional steps to increase on-reserve resident representation. During the summer of 2007, Kenora court officials, including a court interpreter and Aboriginal liaison official for Ontario’s north west region, travelled to 15 First Nations, meeting with community leaders, discussing issues relating to Aboriginal participation in the jury system and requesting updated Band Lists. In addition, Mr. Justice Stach directed that the number of questionnaires to be sent to the on-reserve population for the 2008 roll be increased substantially. Kenora court officials also took additional steps to encourage on-reserve resident participation in juries, including arranging for advance payment of travel, accommodation, and meals expenses and calling jury panels to appear on Tuesdays, rather than travel on Friday and stay the entire weekend waiting for the Monday appearance. Although the data maintained by the Provincial Jury Centre suggests that increasing the number of mailings to on-reserve communities has the effect of increasing the number of eligible on-reserve residents on the jury roll,136 the response rates for eligible on-reserve questionnaires have remained very low – 5.7 percent for the 2008 jury roll,137 5.7 percent for 2009, 6.3 percent for 2010 and 6.3 per cent for 2011.138

144. There have been similar issues with underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on the Thunder Bay judicial district jury roll. In 2011, there were two separate findings that the jury roll for the Thunder Bay district was unrepresentative – both made following the Court of Appeal’s ruling in Pierre v. McRae.

145. In the first case, R. v. Wareham (#1), Madam Justice Pierce determined that the 2011 jury panel selection was not representative. The evidence she heard was that: court officials would send a fax and letter to each First Nations Chief requesting an updated band electoral list, followed by a telephone call; after further efforts to obtain the lists, Court Services Division would then wait to see which First Nations provided the information; only two of the 15 First Nations communities in the Thunder Bay judicial district agreed to provide the information; the lists relied on were generally old, some dating back to 2000; and court officials were not aware of the response rates from on-reserve individuals, discussed above at paragraph 142.

146. In the second case, a coroner’s inquest into the death of Reggie Bushie, the Coroner Dr. Eden also held that the 2011 jury roll was not representative. He noted that residents of First Nations reserves represented five percent of the population in the Judicial District of Thunder Bay but accounted for only 1.3 percent of the jury roll – a result he described as a “serious deficiency.”139 On the basis of these results and a number of “deficiencies” he identified in the processes followed by local court officials, he concluded that the sheriff’s duty of “diligence”, set out in the Nahdee test, had not been met, and the 2011 jury roll was therefore not representative.140

147. In 2012, the R. v. Wareham (#2) case, discussed above at paragraph 129, came back before the court, and the accused once again challenged the representativeness of the jury roll – the 2012 roll this time. The court heard more evidence than had been heard in R. v. Wareham (#1), including evidence with respect to additional efforts that had been made and procedures that had been changed to address the problems in... the 2011 roll. Mr. Justice Platana concluded that, as a result of these additional efforts, the sheriff’s office had satisfied the requirements of section 6(8) of the Juries Act, including that the sheriff exercise due diligence, resourcefulness, ingenuity and perhaps persuasion, rather than passively acquiescing to non-response or chronically ignored requests. As he stated:

I do accept that, on the facts before me, the 2012 Thunder Bay jury roll was compiled in a manner that was representative of the community to the extent currently available. The facts are sufficient to establish that the sheriff did exercise diligence beyond what was done in the preparation of the 2011 and previous jury panels. Beyond the changes to the formal procedure, resourcefulness and ingenuity is demonstrated by the inclusion of a Native Court Worker to assist in obtaining information. Local elders were contacted for assistance. While Bushie describes the sheriff’s duty as including “possibly persuasion”, I also take into account the necessity for cultural sensitivity. When direct refusals to provide lists have been given by the band chiefs and councils, the leaders and decision-makers of their respective communities, and those offers to meet have not been accepted, I have no evidence before me to determine what other “persuasion” might be effective. Their attempts at including First Nations peoples living on-reserve demonstrate a reasonable effort to create a jury roll that is representative of the community.\textsuperscript{141}

148. While these efforts were sufficient to satisfy Mr. Justice Platana that the sheriff’s office had satisfied the requirements of section 6(8), the evidence of court officials in \textit{R. v. Waerham (#2)} was that the response rate for eligible on-reserve questionnaires remained very low at 5.6 per cent.\textsuperscript{142}

F. EXPERIENCE IN OTHER JURISDICTIONS

149. In accordance with paragraph 4 of the Order-in-Council, I have as part of my review considered the law and practice in other jurisdictions to assess what lessons we can learn from them. Underrepresentation of Aboriginal peoples on juries is by no means exclusively an Ontarian or Canadian issue. Rather, this issue exists in various jurisdictions that rely on juries and that have sizeable Aboriginal populations, including other Canadian provinces, New Zealand, Australia, and the United States. In this section, I discuss the ways individuals are selected for jury rolls in other Canadian provinces, as well as Australia, New Zealand and some American states, and how issues of underrepresentation are dealt with in those jurisdictions.

1. EXPERIENCE IN OTHER CANADIAN PROVINCES

150. The underrepresentation of individuals from First Nations communities on jury rolls is a serious concern in a number of provinces across Canada. As described below, the issue was dealt with in Manitoba’s Aboriginal Justice Inquiry, and has also received recent attention from the British Columbia Government. In this section, I discuss the experiences of other provinces with respect to the issue of underrepresentation on jury rolls, as well as measures undertaken to remedy the problem. I will also briefly explain what source lists are used in other provinces to collect the names of prospective jurors.

(A) MANITOBA

151. Manitoba has had extensive experience with the issue of the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on juries, and appears to be the only other province in Canada to have conducted a major review of this issue.

152. In April 1988, the Manitoba government created the Public Inquiry into the Administration of Justice and Aboriginal People in response to two incidents: a 17-year delay in bringing a 1971 murder on a First Nation reserve to trial, and the 1988 death of the executive director of a tribal council at the hands of a police officer, who was exonerated the next day. The Report of the Inquiry did not mince words; it opened by stating that “the justice system has failed Manitoba’s Aboriginal people on a massive scale.” Because the scope of the Inquiry exceeds that of this Independent Review, I will discuss only those parts of the report that addresses the relationship between First Nations in the province and juries.

153. Historically, the jury roll in Manitoba was composed using voting lists. However, members of First Nations and Métis, were denied the vote in Manitoba between 1886 and 1952, and consequently were excluded from potential jury service. While First Nations individuals were granted the right to vote in 1952, their participation on juries did not improve significantly since First Nations officials, unlike mayors, were not required to submit the names of potential jurors to the County Court Judge. After 1971, First Nations officials were required to submit names drawn from their electoral lists.

154. In 1983, the province began using computerized records from the Manitoba Health Services Commission to compose jury lists. The Inquiry found that the use of provincial health records was a preferable source for choosing jurors, because it included First Nations individuals. The Inquiry stated that it was only after 1983 “that Aboriginal people began to be properly represented on the lists of potential jurors”.

However, the Inquiry identified a number of logistical problems that remained and contributed to ongoing underrepresentation.

155. The Inquiry found that First Nations individuals were excluded at two stages of the jury composition process: the summoning of prospective jurors and the pre-trial jury-selection process. The Inquiry concluded that the summoning procedure works against Aboriginal people in a number of ways: summons are sent by mail, but individuals living on reserve often do not have access to regular mail service; individuals living on reserve are less likely to have telephone service at home, and therefore following up on a summons is difficult; and First Nations individuals living in urban centres are more likely to be renters, and therefore accurate records of their current addresses may not exist. Moreover, exemptions are often granted to First Nations individuals on the basis that the costs of travelling to the court and serving on the jury exceeds their means, and many First Nations individuals cannot speak English or French. At the jury selection stage, the Inquiry found that “it is common practice for some Crown attorneys and defence counsel to exclude Aboriginal jurors through the use of stand-asides and peremptory challenges.” The examples they provide are compelling. In the Helen Betty Osborne case in The Pas, the jury had no Aboriginal members, in spite of the fact that it was in an area of Manitoba where Aboriginal people comprise over 50% of the population. All six Aboriginal people called forward were the subjects of peremptory challenges from the defence. Similarly, on one day of the Thompson assizes, 35 of 41 Aboriginal people called to serve on three juries were rejected through peremptory challenges and stand-asides. “In one case, the Crown rejected 16 Aboriginal jurors; in another, the defence rejected two and the Crown rejected 10; in the third and final case, the defence accepted all the proposed Aboriginal jurors, while the Crown rejected nine. Two jurors were rejected twice.”

156. The Law Reform Commission of Canada described the importance of peremptory challenges in the following manner:

> the peremptory challenge has been attacked and praised. Its importance lies in the fact that justice must be seen to be done. The peremptory challenge is one tool by which the accused can feel that he or she has some minimal control over the make up of the jury and can eliminate persons for whatever reason, no matter how illogical or irrational, he or she does not wish to try the case.¹⁴³

However, the Inquiry found that this power to exclude potential jurors for ‘illogical or irrational’ reasons has undesirable effects on the racial make-up of jury panels.¹⁴⁰

157. To address the exclusion of First Nations individuals at the summons stage, the Inquiry recommended that where the sheriff grants an exemption from jury service (for instance on the basis that the person called cannot speak the language of the trial), that person must be replaced by someone from the same community. It also recommended that summonses be enforced, even where enough people have been found for the jury panel (given the lack of access to regular mail, First Nations individuals who do respond to a summons have often done so well after others with regular access to mail). With respect to the exclusion of First Nations individuals at the jury-selection stage, the Inquiry recommended that: peremptory challenges and stand-asides be eliminated altogether; that jurors be drawn from within 40 kilometers of the community where the trial is to be held; that in the event jurors need to be drawn from elsewhere, they should be selected from a community as similar as possible demographically and culturally to the community where the offence took place; and that the Juries Act should be amended to provide translation services for First Nations jurors who do not speak English or French but who are otherwise qualified to serve.¹⁴¹

158. It should be noted that, in response to the Supreme Court’s decision in R v. Bain, Parliament in 1992 amended section 634 of the Criminal Code to eliminate the practice of stand-asides by the Crown, thereby remedying the asymmetry in power between the defence’s right to peremptorily challenge and the Crown’s right to stand-aside potential jurors.¹⁴² Parliament replaced stand-asides with equal endowments of peremptory challenges for the Crown and the defence.¹⁴³ But this amendment does not change the underlying ability to discriminate in jury selection processes. Otherwise left unchecked, the amendment merely equalizes the discriminatory power inherent to peremptory challenges.

(B) BRITISH COLUMBIA

159. The British Columbia Jury Act gives the sheriff broad discretion in creating the jury roll for the province. Section 2 of the Act establishes the principle that “a person has the right and duty to serve as a juror unless disqualified or exempted under this Act”, while section 8 states that “[h]aving regard for the principle in section 2, the sheriff may determine the procedures the sheriff considers appropriate for the selection of jurors.”¹⁴⁴ In practice, the sheriff uses provincial voters’ lists to select prospective jurors,¹⁴⁵ but there are concerns that the list does not properly capture individuals living in First Nations communities.

160. In 2011, following Ontario judicial decisions such as the Court of Appeal’s decision in Pierre v. McRae, the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA) began an investigation of the practices followed... by the sheriff’s office in British Columbia with respect to First Nations. In June 2011, the BCCLA wrote to British Columbia’s Attorney General, stating that, as a result of its investigation, the BCCLA had become concerned that juries in British Columbia might suffer from similar underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on jury rolls. In its letter, the BCCLA stated that it did not appear the First Nations communities were being consistently included on the provincial voters list or directly contacted by Sheriffs’ Offices.

161. British Columbia’s Attorney General responded to the BCCLA letter in July 2011. In his response, he stated that in order to improve the sheriffs’ database, a senior Court Services official had written to all Band leaders in the province requesting their lists of persons residing on reserves. He also stated that the database that British Columbia sheriffs obtain from Elections BC is significantly different from the database that Ontario sheriffs obtain from the municipal assessment rolls in that First Nations persons living on reserves are included to some degree in the British Columbia database. He acknowledged, however, that no one knew the extent to which First Nations individuals chose to be enumerated and the reason the Ministry was taking the extra step to write to First Nations was to ensure that “they were given an opportunity to be included in the database.”

(C) NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

162. With its vast size and low population density, the Northwest Territories faces particular challenges in holding jury trials. Jury trials became available in the Northwest Territories in 1955. However, between 1955 and 1968, Aboriginal individuals served on juries in only 27 of the 66 jury trials held in the Northwest Territories, despite forming an overwhelming majority of the Northwest Territories population. Steps were taken during this period to improve the participation of Aboriginal peoples in the jury process. For instance, Mr. Justice Sissons, who was appointed to the Northwest Territories Territorial Court in 1955, committed the court to holding trials in the community where a crime took place and established a circuit court that travelled throughout the territory to hear criminal cases.

163. In 1988, the Northwest Territories Jury Act was amended to permit jurors fluent in only one of the Territories’ official languages to sit as a juror. There are eleven official languages in the Northwest Territories:
Chipewyan, Cree, South Slavey, North Slavey, Gwich’in, Inuvialukutin, Inuinnaqtun, Tlicho, Inuktitut, English, and French. Consequently, under the amended section of the Jury Act, a First Nations individual living in the Northwest Territories who speaks only one or several First Nations languages can serve on a jury.
To carry these reforms into effect, the Department of Justice in the Northwest Territories established an interpreter training program, consisting of an eight week course, with two weeks spent focusing on jury trials. These interpreters play a number of roles during trials, including assisting the sheriff in assembling jury panels by explaining to people why they have been summoned, and translating evidence, arguments, and closing and opening statements.

164. The jury roll in the Northwest Territories is composed by the sheriff, who obtains the names of residents in the Territories from the Director of Medical Insurance. However, the regulations passed under the Jury Act permit the sheriff to use other source lists, including electoral and assessment rolls. The jury list for each trial is “drawn from within thirty kilometers of the court,” and consequently prospective jurors are nearly all from the same community as the accused. The emphasis on involving the community in the criminal justice system was praised by the Manitoba Public Inquiry into the Administration of Justice, which stated:

This solution is attractive to us, since it seeks to return to the community involved in a direct sense of involvement in, and control and understanding of, the justice system. [...] In aboriginal areas, those people would be able to understand the nuances that might apply to the relationship between victim and accused, or local factors that might escape the attention of non-aboriginal people.

165. While there are significant differences between the Northwest Territories and Ontario, there are also certain similarities: the size and remoteness of the First Nations communities in Ontario’s northern judicial districts; their perspectives on justice issues; and the fact that some First Nations individuals still speak only Aboriginal languages. As I discuss in my recommendations below, some of the approaches adopted in the Northwest Territories merit consideration in the Ontario context.

(D) ALBERTA

166. The Alberta Jury Act authorizes the sheriff in that province to obtain names for jury rolls using information from lists provided by the municipal property officer, including the list of electors, the assessment rolls, and any other public papers. The Jury Act Regulation further specifies that jury selection may be made from any or all of: (a) lists of electors, assessment rolls and other public papers obtained from municipalities; (b) telephone directories; (c) Henderson’s Directories for municipalities; and (d) any other source that the sheriff considers appropriate.

167. There appear to have been some concerns expressed at various times as to whether the Alberta jury list is representative of First Nations peoples. In 1991, an Alberta task force examining the criminal justice system and Aboriginal peoples was told that Aboriginal persons were not being summoned for jury duty. It recommended that Aboriginal peoples be included on jury lists.

(E) OTHER PROVINCES THAT USE HEALTH INSURANCE RECORDS TO COMPILE THE JURY ROLL

168. As I described above in my discussion of the experience of Manitoba, it has, since 1983, relied on computerized records from the Manitoba Health Services Commission to compose jury lists, a practice that Manitoba’s Public Inquiry into the Administration of Justice and Aboriginal People described as a preferable source for compiling the jury roll. Saskatchewan, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador (and the Northwest Territories, as mentioned above) have adopted this same approach.

169. Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan’s Jury Act empowers the Inspector of Legal Offices to requisition the register maintained for the Saskatchewan Medical Care Insurance Act as the source list for jury rolls in the province. This practice appears to have been adopted as a result of a proposal initially made by the Law

Reform Commission of Saskatchewan, which recommended in its report Proposals for the Reform of the Jury Act, after canvassing potential sources for the jury pool, that the best available source was the list of beneficiaries under the Saskatchewan Hospitalization Act.[171]

170. Quebec. The Quebec Jurors Act requires the sheriff to collect the names of prospective jurors from the electoral roll, but makes special provision for First Nations people living on-reserve. In particular, the Quebec Act permits the sheriff to gather the names of First Nations people living on-reserve using municipal valuation rolls, Band Lists drawn up in accordance with the Indian Act, and the population register of the Ministère de la Santé et des Services sociaux.[172]

171. New Brunswick. The New Brunswick Jury Act empowers the sheriff to collect names from lists of the following: beneficiaries under the Medical Services Payment Act, electors under the Elections Act, electors under the Municipal Elections Act, and registered owners of motor vehicles under the Motor Vehicle Act.

172. Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotia Juries Act empowers the sheriff to collect names from the province’s Health and Wellness’ Health Insurance list.[173] The issue of representation of First Nations peoples on juries has been given some attention in Nova Scotia. In 1994, the Law Reform Commission of Nova Scotia recommended that educational materials be made available in the Mi’kmaq language to foster greater interest in the jury system among members of that community.[174] The Commission also recommended that the province cease choosing jurors from the voters list and substitute a more comprehensive computerized list such as the medical service insurance list,[175] a recommendation that led to the adoption of that practice by the government. The Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr. Prosecution in 1989 also dealt with this issue, encouraging further study on the issue of proportional representation of minorities (including Mi’kmaq) on juries, in light of concerns about underrepresentation.[176]

173. Prince Edward Island. Under the Prince Edward Island Jury Act, the sheriff acquires names for the jury roll by requisitioning from time to time the names of residents in the province registered under the Health Services Payment Act.[177]

174. Newfoundland and Labrador. The Newfoundland and Labrador Jury Act allows the sheriff to refer to multiple source lists to create the jury roll. In particular, the sheriff can refer to the list of electors under the Elections Act, 1991, motor vehicle registration records under the Highway Safety Traffic Act, and the list of beneficiaries under the Medical Care Insurance Act, 1999.[178] Additionally, the regulations passed under that Act permit the sheriff to look to the licensed drivers database, the membership list of a francophone association, the telephone directory, and any other source considered appropriate by the sheriff.[179]

2. EXPERIENCE IN OTHER COUNTRIES

(A) AUSTRALIA

175. Aboriginals have historically been underrepresented on juries throughout Australia. In a 1983 report on Aboriginal Customary Law, the Australian Law Reform Commission wrote:

... the representation of Aborigines on juries has changed little in recent years. In those parts of Australia where Aborigines represent a sizeable proportion of the population, it is still rare for an Aborigine to sit on a jury.180

176. More recent publications and law reform commission reports indicate that, while efforts have been made to improve Aboriginal representation on juries in Australia, it remains a live issue in all six states across the country.

177. Each state exercises general legislative powers over matters of criminal law and procedure, including the process of jury trial.181 At a general level, the process for composing the jury roll is similar in most states: the sheriff randomly selects names from electoral rolls for inclusion on jury rolls. However, the minutiae of the selection process differs across states, resulting in varying degrees of jury representativeness throughout the country.

178. The law reform commissions of three states – New South Wales, Queensland and Western Australia – have conducted extensive and recent examinations of the jury system. The reports of these commissions have included discussions respecting the underrepresentation of Aboriginals on jury rolls and made a number of findings and recommendations, which I mention below.

179. As in Canada, the value of a representative jury is recognized in Australia. As the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia stated in its 2009 report, "representation is generally considered to be the principal concept guiding juror selection."182 According to the Commission, it is through its representativeness that the criminal justice system derives its legitimacy,183 and a representative jury is "a body of persons representative of the wider community".184 But the Commission also made clear that a jury does not have to be proportionately representative of the community at large; rather, it is enough that “all ethnic and social groups in the community should have the opportunity to be represented on juries (emphasis in original).”185

180. Unlike in the United States or Canada, voting is mandatory in Australia. Consequently, voting lists in that country are more likely than those in Canada or the United States to be comprehensive. There is no evidence that Aboriginals in Australia are registered to vote in lower proportions than those of the descendants of European settlers, since the voting registration system does not record race. However, the Queensland Law Reform Commission, in its 2011 report, suggested that Aboriginals may be underrepresented on that state’s electoral roll because of low-levels of education and literacy, health and social conditions, and the general remoteness of indigenous communities and the transient nature of their inhabitants.186 The Commission recommended that people be asked to register as Aboriginal when they register to vote in order to provide more information on this point.187 The Commission also found that Aboriginals are more likely than non-Aboriginals to live outside of jury districts.\footnote{Law Reform Commission of New South Wales, supra note 184 at 11.21, 11.69.} In addition, Aboriginals are more difficult to summon because they are more likely to lead transient lifestyles.\footnote{Ibid., at 6.57.}

181. Even if a summons is issued, a variety of factors mean that Aboriginals are more likely to be disqualified or will otherwise not become a part of the jury panel. For instance, in some states public transport is limited and prospective Aboriginal jurors may be unable to travel to the court for jury selection. Similarly, a lack of available accommodation near the court increases the likelihood that Aboriginals will be unable to serve on a jury. Aboriginals are also more likely to be disqualified on the basis of prior convictions, because, like Aboriginal persons in Canada, they are disproportionately overrepresented in the criminal justice system and in prison.\footnote{Ibid., at 6.57.} Moreover, they are also more likely to lack the necessary language skills to serve on a jury.\footnote{Ibid., at 47.}

182. The Australian law reform commissions have also identified various cultural factors that may explain Aboriginal underrepresentation. For example, the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia noted that Aboriginal jurors had expressed discomfort about being required to judge people they did not know.\footnote{Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, supra note 182 at 94.} Similarly, the Law Reform Commission of New South Wales notes that in the past Aboriginals have asked to be excused from jury service on the basis that sitting in judgment of another may harm their standing with their community.\footnote{Ibid., at 47.} At the jury panel selection stage, the commentator, Mark Israel, notes that there is evidence in New South Wales that some prosecutors have challenged the inclusion of Aboriginal jurors in cases where the defendant was also Aboriginal.\footnote{Mark Israel, “Ethnic Bias in Jury Selection in Australia and New Zealand” (1998) International Journal of Sociology 35 at 44.}

183. Australian law reform commissions have proposed various measures to remedy Aboriginal underrepresentation on jury panels. To address the issue of underrepresentation as a result of prior convictions (given that Aboriginals represent a disproportionate percentage of the prison population in Australia), the Law Reform Commission of New South Wales recommended reducing the number of years that offenders are barred from jury service from ten years for all offences to two to five years, depending on the type of offence.\footnote{Law Reform Commission of New South Wales, supra note 184 at 3.19-3.23.} This recommendation was enacted into law by the New South Wales Jury Amendment Act 2010, which removed the uniform ten-year disqualification and replaced it with a graduated scheme for the exclusion of people on the basis of criminal history.\footnote{Ibid., at 6.148-6.150.} This proposal was also endorsed by the Queensland Law Reform Commission.\footnote{Ibid., at 11.86, 11.18-11.19.} With respect to the issue of Aboriginals living outside of the jury district, the Queensland Law Reform Commission recommended that local governments review existing jury districts with a view to including Aboriginal communities, while the Law Commission of New South Wales proposed the adoption of a ‘smart electoral roll’ that would provide a more flexible tool for including individuals on the local court’s jury roll.\footnote{Ibid., at 11.86.} Finally, the Queensland Law Reform Commission proposed a series of logistical measures aimed at improving Aboriginal underrepresentation, including: making transport arrangements to ensure that Aboriginals can attend court when summoned, making available accommodation near the court for people who cannot travel to the court each day of a trial, creating culturally appropriate educational programs to promote the importance of jury service, conducting more extensive research, and establishing a working group to ensure that any reforms are successful.\footnote{Ibid., at 11.86.}
184. However, the law reform commissions have rejected more radical suggestions for improving representativeness that have also been rejected by Canadian courts. For instance, the Law Reform Commission of New South Wales rejected the use of special panels composed largely (or entirely) of members of the racial or ethnic group of the accused owing to the practical difficulties associated with their establishment, among other things.200 Similarly, the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia found that allowing a trial judge to order the inclusion of a person of the same race or ethnic group of the accused would not be appropriate, since it would interfere with the principle of random selection.201 The Queensland Law Reform Commission rejected a similar proposal.202

(B) NEW ZEALAND

185. The New Zealand Law Commission conducted an extensive study of the use of criminal jury trials in that country in 2001 and found that the Māori people in New Zealand, like First Nations in Canada, are underrepresented on juries and overrepresented as defendants in criminal proceedings.203 The New Zealand Law Commission identified ‘representativeness’ as one of four necessary features of the jury system,204 and they provided the following definition: “what is required [for a representative jury] is that all persons who are eligible to serve on juries, including those you are younger or older, or from ethnic minorities, do have an equal opportunity to serve (emphasis in original).”205 In their report, the New Zealand Law Commission recommended a number of measures to make juries generally more representative, including: improving the representativeness of jury rolls (the source of jury lists) through outreach campaigns that encourage young people and minorities to become registered voters; extending judicial district boundaries; considering the question of representativeness in applications for a change of venue where the demographic composition of the jury roll in the venue where the crime is to be tried creates a likelihood of prejudice; and updating guidelines for excusing jurors to allow jurors to defer their service, rather than be excused from it altogether.206

186. As in Canada, the history of the introduction of a foreign legal system and the exclusion of the Māori people from this system has created a sense of alienation. In the New Zealand Law Commission’s consultations with Māori people, many of the same concerns raised by members of First Nations communities in our discussions as part of this Independent Review were raised. As the Commission stated: “it was emphasized to us that many Māori feel very strongly that juries are not representative of Māori society, and this underrepresentation contributes to a general feeling of alienation from the criminal justice system.”207

187. The Commission identified the three main reasons for the underrepresentation of Māori on juries lists. First, jury lists in New Zealand are drawn from voters lists, but Māori are far less likely than those of European ancestry to be registered voters. Second, once summoned to the court for jury selection, Māori are more likely than other citizens to be excused or disqualified. Third, once chosen for the jury panel they are more likely to be challenged by the Crown or by the defence.208 One study reported that several of the lawyers and judges interviewed believed that prosecutors “tended to weed out Māori jurors because they were Māori when there was a Māori defendant”.209 Various authors have also suggested that Māori have been excluded from juries because courthouses are predominantly located in the cities, while Māori mostly live in rural areas, and Māori are more mobile than other citizens and are therefore less likely to have a permanent address where a summons can be sent.210

188. The Commission’s study considered two solutions to Māori underrepresentation on juries: using source lists other than the electoral roll to select potential jurors, and ensuring that the proportion of Māori selected for jury lists is the same as the proportion in the jury district’s broader population. Ultimately, the Commission rejected both of these solutions.211 Using source lists other than the electoral roll would be unduly cumbersome and expensive, and instead, greater efforts should be made to encourage more Māori to register to vote. Tailoring the number of Māori selected for jury lists to the number living in the jury district was similarly unacceptable since it would run counter to the principle of ensuring a representative jury. The Commission stated that “once an exception is made for one group there is no reason in principle why it should not be made for all other ethnic minorities and any other group.”212 In addition, the Commission found that practical difficulties such as securing adequate childcare during jury service imposed a particular burden on Māori individuals, and that making childcare allowances available would help to remedy this problem.213

(C) UNITED STATES

189. There are fifty states in the United States, each with its own court system and jury selection process, as well as a federal court system with its own jury selection process. For this Report, I will deal only with two American states: Alaska because of its sizable Aboriginal population; and New York because of the particular steps it has taken to deal with the underrepresentation of minorities on its juries. At the federal court level, the Jury Selection and Service Act stipulates that names for the jury source list are to be drawn from voter registration lists, lists of actual voters, and other available sources where necessary.214

Aboriginal people who retained their tribal membership were formally excluded from federal juries until 1924, when Congress declared them citizens.215

(i) Alaska

190. Alaska’s Aboriginal population represents approximately 16 per cent of that state’s overall population, but like many jurisdictions in Canada, the Aboriginal population is “overrepresented within Alaska prisons”.216 Much of Alaska’s Aboriginal population lives in a series of about 200 small villages (referred to collectively as ‘the Bush’) outside of Alaska’s main population centers of Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks.217 These cities are also home to the state’s courts. Needless to say, the conditions and lifestyles in the Bush differ considerably from those in Alaska’s major cities.

191. The standard practice in the state for holding trials prior to 1971 was to transport defendants to one of these cities for trial, and to select a jury from residents living within a fifteen mile radius of the trial site.218 However, since the majority of the state’s Aboriginal population lives in rural areas, this mode of selection often resulted in Aboriginals facing an all-white jury whose members were utterly unfamiliar with lifestyles and conditions in rural communities.219

212 ibid., at para. 173.
213 ibid., at para. 496.
218 ibid., at 247.
219 ibid., at 255.
192. Recognizing these and other difficulties that arise where Aboriginals are tried before a jury composed entirely of non-Aboriginals, the Alaska Supreme Court in Alvarado v. State declared the practice of drawing jurors from within a fifty-mile radius of the trial unconstitutional.\(^{220}\) In particular, the Court found that this practice violated an accused’s Sixth Amendment right to be tried by a jury drawn “from a pool representing a fair cross-section of the community”.\(^{221}\) In Alvarado, the defendant was accused of rape in the community of Chignik, Alaska. He was arrested in Chignik and transported approximately 463 miles to Anchorage for trial. The population of Chignik was at the time 95 percent Aboriginal, while only 3.5 percent of Anchorage’s population was Aboriginal.\(^{222}\) Pursuant to the rules governing the selection of juries in force at the time, the jury was drawn from within fifteen miles of the site of the trial, and consequently, not a single Aboriginal person appeared on Alvarado’s jury panel, let alone the petit jury.\(^{223}\) Alvarado was found guilty, but he successfully challenged the composition of his jury panel in an appeal before the Alaska Supreme Court by arguing that the jury selection process “precluded residents from Chignik and virtually all Native villages within the district, thus violating his constitutional right to an impartial jury”.\(^{224}\) In finding that this policy for selecting jurors was unconstitutional, the Alaska Supreme Court wrote that substituting members of one community (in this case Chignik) with those from another (Anchorage) substantially impairs “the democratic ideal inherent in the notion of an impartial jury as an institution representing a fair cross section of the community”.\(^{225}\) Instead, the community that must be represented on the jury panel is the community where the crime is alleged to have taken place.

193. In response to the Alaska Supreme Court’s decision in Alvarado, the state legislature adopted Alaska Criminal Procedure Rule 18.\(^ {226}\) Rule 18 introduces a number of steps to help increase Aboriginal representation on juries in Alaska. First, it increases the number of trial sites outside of the state’s major urban centers and requires that jurors be called from within a fifty-mile radius of each trial site. Second, it gives the trial judge the discretion to limit the number of miles from the courthouse from which prospective jurors are chosen; however the accused is given a corresponding right to have jurors called from the entire fifty mile radius if the first jury pool “fails to fairly represent a cross-section of the community”.\(^ {227}\) Third, the defendant is given the right to move, within ten days of entering a plea, for the trial to be relocated from the presumptive trial site to an alternative trial site within the venue district that is nearest to the site where the crime occurred.\(^ {228}\) Fourth, if the fifty mile radius rule is unlikely to result in a jury that is representative of a fair cross-section of society, the accused or the court can request a change in the jury selection area.\(^ {229}\) In practice, this latter rule may be carried out in three ways: the trial venue may be relocated to a community that is more representative; the court may draw prospective jurors from beyond the fifty mile radius; or the court may organize the trial in a community where no trial site exists but which is more representative.\(^ {230}\)

194. Although the implementation of Rule 18 has made important steps towards improving Aboriginal representation on juries in Alaska, several commentators have identified remaining difficulties. For instance, certain rural communities are excluded because they do not fall within the fifty mile radius. Moreover, Rule 18 imposes the onus on defendants to request a change of venue within ten days; however they are often ignorant of this right.\(^ {231}\)

(ii) New York

195. New York uses a multiple source list approach to create its jury roll. The names of prospective jurors are drawn from the following five lists: registered voters, the holders of drivers’ licenses or other identification issued by the Division of Motor Vehicles, state income tax filers, recipients of family assistance, and recipients of unemployment insurance.\textsuperscript{232} The state updates these lists annually and has eliminated all automatic exemptions for jury service. At $40 per day, the state pays one of the highest juror per diems in the United States. New Yorkers can also volunteer for jury duty, and after jury questionnaires have been sent out, two-follow ups are immediately sent to non-responders.

196. New York has taken a number of steps in response to biases against minorities in the state’s court system. In 1988, the Chief Judge of New York created the Judicial Commission on Minorities, which exists to this day, as a body to study this problem and make recommendations to improve minority interactions with the court system. In a five-volume report issued in 1991, the Commission concluded that minorities are significantly underrepresented on many juries in the court system.\textsuperscript{233} The Commission found that all-white juries in New York were a regular occurrence and minorities charged with an offence were likely to face juries where their peers are not represented.\textsuperscript{234} Moreover, the Commission’s report noted that there was evidence of peremptory challenges being used to exclude minorities from jury panels in trials where the defendant is also a member of a minority group.\textsuperscript{235}

197. To address these shortcomings, the Commission made a number of recommendations, including expanding the number of sources from which prospective jurors are selected for the jury source list. In addition, the Commission recommended that measures be put in place to allow jurors to be “on call” for a trial.\textsuperscript{236} This recommendation, which has been implemented, means that persons may be on call for a one-day trial for several days, and if they are not called, but were available, their jury duty is considered complete.\textsuperscript{237} The Commission’s report also recommended strict judicial scrutiny over peremptory challenges to ensure that prospective minority jurors are not improperly excluded and that jury questionnaires record race in order to provide more information for further study.

198. As a result of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in \textit{Batson v. Kentucky}, the U.S. has constitutional limits on the use of peremptory challenges, banning their use in a racially discriminatory manner.\textsuperscript{238} Subsequent cases have expanded this prohibition, widening the group of persons subject to the rule to include the defence counsel and lawyers in civil cases, and widening the group of prohibitions to include challenges based on sex, while some lower courts have added religion to the list.\textsuperscript{239}

199. New York State has developed a line of jurisprudence under the \textit{Batson} rule that appears to be broader than the rest of the country’s application of those precedents. In its 2008 decision in \textit{People v. Luciano}, the New York Court of Appeals noted that courts should forbid peremptory challenges based on “race, gender, or any other status that implicates equal protection concerns”.\textsuperscript{240} In one recent case, people with a hunting license were found to satisfy this test, and a mistrial was declared because the defence counsel peremptorily challenged all potential jurors with a hunting license.\textsuperscript{241}

200. Finally, in New York State, it is possible to volunteer for jury duty. The list of volunteers is used to supplement the five source lists that counties use to compile their jury rolls. Judge Dwyer of the New York Rensselaer County Court has gone so far as to mail “coupons” to residents, urging individuals to volunteer their names for the master jury list by filling out the form and mailing it back. One thousand residents responded to this initiative in 1993, and several hundred to a similar initiative in 1984.242 Accepting volunteers seems to be a useful way to supplement the master source list with names of residents who do not appear on the other lists used.

(iii) Sending Jury Roll Questionnaires to Areas with Significant Minority Populations

201. In 2006, following a 2005 study by U.S. District Judge Nancy Gertner, the U.S. District Court of Massachusetts revised its jury plan along the following lines: “a jury summons returned as undeliverable from any of the court’s three geographic divisions will spur the court to send another summons to another resident in the same zip code.”243 Also, to keep lists more up to date and to try to negate the effects of a more transient renter population, the jury roll derived from postal addresses will be updated every six months.244

202. Based on this initiative, the U.S. District Court of Kansas amended its jury plan in 2007 to include a “supplemental draw” in which the response to an undeliverable summons will be sending of a new summons to someone in the same zip code.245 This initiative not only includes undeliverable summonses, but also nonresponsive ones, an expansion on the Massachusetts initiative.

203. Currently, an ad hoc committee of Eastern Michigan judges, appointed by Chief Judge Gerald Rosen and co-chaired by Judge Victoria Roberts, is considering reforms to the jury selection system in the U.S. District Court of Eastern Michigan along similar lines of those of Massachusetts and Kansas, outlined above.246

FIRST NATIONS REPRESENTATION ON ONTARIO JURIES

CHILL THEIR DESIRE TO SERVE ON ONTARIO JURIES

209. In the opinion of First Nations representatives we met, the most significant systemic barrier to the participation of First Nations peoples in the jury system in Ontario is the negative role the criminal justice system has played in their lives, culture, values, and laws throughout history. This became very apparent in discussions with First Nations leaders, Elders, and others during the engagement sessions. They uniformly expressed the position that, until significant and substantive changes are made to the criminal justice system, the issue of jury participation will not improve.

(i) Cultural Barriers

210. One of the biggest challenges expressed by many First Nations leaders and people is with respect to the conflict that exists between First Nations' cultural values, laws, and ideologies regarding traditional approaches to conflict resolution, and the values and laws that underpin the Canadian justice system. The objective of the traditional First Nations' approach to justice is to re-attain harmony, balance, and healing with respect to a particular offence, rather than seeking retribution and punishment. First Nations observe the Canadian justice system as devoid of any reflection of their core principles or values, and view it as a foreign system that has been imposed upon them without their consent.

211. Unfortunately, the criminal justice system represents deep-rooted pain and oppression for many First Nations peoples. The system is perceived not only as a tool to subjugate traditional approaches to conflict resolution in favour of assimilation into the mainstream society, but also as a mechanism by which a myriad of historical wrongs have been perpetrated upon First Nations. Today, First Nations peoples see themselves either as spectators to or victims of the justice system, whereas historically they were direct participants in the resolution of conflict within their own communities. To be asked to participate in Canada's justice system is seen by many First Nations people as contributing to their own oppression and, therefore, repugnant. These sentiments are not surprising, as many experts and authors have recognized the failure of the justice system for First Nations. For example, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal People observed:

The Canadian criminal justice system has failed the Aboriginal peoples of Canada - First Nations, Inuit and Métis people, on-reserve and off-reserve, urban and rural - in all territorial and governmental jurisdictions. The principal reason for this crushing failure is the fundamentally different world views of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people with respect to such elemental issues as the substantive content of justice and the process of achieving justice.247

212. That being said, however, a number of the First Nations people with whom I met expressed a willingness and desire to work towards a reconciliatory model of justice that respects and incorporates First Nations traditional values and laws as a matter of self-governance within Canada's justice system. I will discuss this desire in more detail later in the Report.

213. Another core traditional First Nations value that often prevents many First Nations people from participating on juries for criminal trials relates to the cultural teaching that a person is not to sit in judgment of the actions of another or to direct a person's actions. Rather than judge an offence committed by an individual and determine his or her fate, the traditional Aboriginal justice process was aimed at restoring the offender and the victim to a place of harmony, peace, healing, and reconciliation. Because criminal trials require the jury to make a finding of guilt or innocence, which potentially affects a person's future in a negative way, many First Nations people feel unwilling to participate in that process. It is noteworthy that many First Nations people expressed an interest in participating in coroner’s inquests, viewing the role of the coroner’s jury, which does not make findings of guilt and which recommends changes to a system to prevent similar tragedies, as more aligned with their cultural understandings and ideologies.

(ii) Systemic Discrimination

214. First Nations people often spoke of the systemic discrimination that either they or their families have experienced within the justice system as it related to criminal justice or child welfare. Negative experiences of the criminal justice system, along with historic limitations on the rights of First Nations, have created negative perspectives and an intergenerational mistrust of the criminal justice system. Such perceptions, by implication, extend to participation in the jury process. First Nations people generally view the criminal justice system as working against them, rather than for them. It seems counterintuitive to them to participate in it.

215. I heard numerous tragic stories of First Nations individuals’ experiences with the justice system at various levels, and what they clearly revealed were pervasive systemic problems with the way in which justice is delivered, and is seen to be delivered, to First Nations individuals. Many persons accused of crimes plead guilty to their offences, rather than electing trial, in order to have their charge resolved quickly but without appreciating the consequences of their decision. In fact, many First Nations individuals explained that they have never known a friend or family member who, when charged, proceeded to trial. Many of these accused persons believe they will not receive a fair trial owing to racist attitudes prevalent in the justice system, including those of jury members. A question was raised about whether the so-called Gladue reports were being properly prepared, or if they were even prepared at all for First Nations offenders. Also mentioned was the fact that provincial court judges attend remote First Nations communities only once every 60 to 90 days, resulting in long delays. Lastly, remands were mentioned in the context that they are a common occurrence and many cannot afford to travel to larger communities where the nearest Superior Court of Justice is located.

216. I also heard about the need for court workers in the communities to assist with the court process, and the absence of translation services afforded to First Nations people who do not speak English, leading to fundamental misunderstandings of the criminal justice process and, consequently, a guilty plea or a conviction. More disturbing were the anecdotes relayed to me regarding inhumane treatment afforded to First Nations people in jail. For example, I was told of a First Nations accused person being released from a Kenora jail without footwear or socks in the winter months. I was also told about the general ill-treatment and lack of dignity afforded to First Nations people in jail by the guards, and the lack of support and adequate probation services for offenders upon release from jail to facilitate their integration back into the community, which often contributes to re-offending.

217. Because my review was not a formal witness hearing inquiry, I did not ascertain the truth of these allegations. Quite frankly, that is not relevant. Even if they are only perceptions, they are instructive, because to First Nations people those perceptions inform their opinion about the justice system and that is the relevant and important consideration.

218. According to First Nations people with whom I spoke, there is a real fear that the passage of the Safe Streets and Communities Act, recently enacted legislation that among other things imposes mandatory minimum sentences, eliminates conditional sentences, and extends the time before which applications for pardon can be made, will perpetuate the systemic discrimination in the justice system and increase the rate of incarcerated First Nations people, many of whom would not otherwise be incarcerated, such as first time and non-violent offenders.\(^{248}\) Many First Nations people believe this Act will reduce funding for crime prevention, police enforcement, and victim and rehabilitation programs – all core justice-related services that First Nations communities urgently need.

219. Justice challenges in northern First Nations communities are distinct and more drastic than appears to be the case in central and southern First Nations communities. The First Nations people I met in northern communities described a systemic lack of access to adequate legal services to defend charges, a deficiency that not only compromises their legal rights but also compounds their aversion to participate in the jury system. As mentioned above, the remote locations of First Nations require duty counsel and judges to fly into communities in varying frequency – typically every 60 to 90 days for one to two day periods – and limit access to their legal counsel. These circumstances pose challenges that compromise a First Nation accused’s ability to properly defend himself or herself.

220. The lack of adequate infrastructure available to house court proceedings poses another challenge that compromises the delivery of justice in the North. It was explained that First Nations individuals in certain regions must attend court to address their charges in make-shift court rooms temporarily housed in arenas or dilapidated community halls. These venues do not provide adequate space for private interview rooms, and create an environment that lacks the decorum, respect, and formality ordinarily required for a court of law. It is understandable that First Nations people are reluctant to participate in the justice system, and particularly on juries, when their interactions with the system are anything but positive, respectful, or fair.

221. Since at least 1999, the Supreme Court of Canada has repeatedly recognized the urgency of measures required to address the crisis the criminal justice system presents to First Nations peoples. In R. v. Gladue, after recounting the numerous reports and studies on the Aboriginal justice issues, the Court stated:

> These findings cry out for recognition of the magnitude and gravity of the problem, and for responses to alleviate it. The figures are stark and reflect what may fairly be termed a crisis in the Canadian criminal justice system. The drastic overrepresentation of aboriginal peoples within both the Canadian prison population and the criminal justice system reveals a sad and pressing social problem.249

222. Most recently, the Supreme Court had an opportunity to assess the impact of its earlier decision in Gladue, and the hope for changes to the criminal justice system that would address systemic issues affecting First Nations peoples. This assessment was not positive:

> This cautious optimism has not been borne out. In fact, statistics indicate that the over-representation and alienation of Aboriginal peoples in the criminal justice system has only worsened. In the immediate aftermath of Bill C-41, from 1996 to 2001, Aboriginal admissions to custody increased by 3 percent while non-Aboriginal admissions declined by 22 percent... From 2001 to 2006, there was an overall decline in prison admissions of 9 percent. During that same time period, Aboriginal admissions to custody increased by 4 percent... As a result, the overrepresentation of Aboriginal people in the criminal justice system is worse than ever. Whereas Aboriginal persons made up 12 percent of all federal inmates in 1999 when Gladue was decided, they accounted for 17 percent of federal admissions in 2005... As Professor Rudin asks: “If Aboriginal overrepresentation was a crisis in 1999, what term can be applied to the situation today?”250

223. Despite this grim backdrop, I engaged in a number of positive discussions with First Nations leaders and community members regarding initiatives First Nations had taken to assert leadership over various aspects of the justice system in their respective communities. First Nations leaders in various communities recalled a time when the Province had funded a restorative justice program. As I understand it, this program allowed First Nations to develop a cultural approach to justice through the organization of justice committees that began to integrate First Nations principles into the delivery of justice. In particular, in Sandy Lake First Nation, I heard about the consultative role of Elders in the sentencing of First Nations offenders.

250 R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13 at para. 62. Citations embedded in the quotation have been omitted.
originally developed through the restorative justice program. This practice has been admirably accepted by the local judiciary, and has continued, with Elders volunteering in the face of funding cuts to a program they deemed too important to end. I was advised that Elder advisors were also used in the Attawapiskat First Nation. These are the kind of steps that are helpful in moving towards the integration of First Nations principles and values into the justice system.

(iii) Education

224. First Nations people lack knowledge and awareness of the justice system generally, and the jury system, in particular. It was understandably expressed that most First Nations individuals will refrain from participating in a process about which they know nothing. Many First Nations people were unaware that the same jury roll was used to select juries for both trials and coroner’s inquests. Therefore, most leaders identified the need for a focused and sustained education strategy for First Nations communities with respect to the role of juries in the justice system and the process by which jury rolls and jury panels are created, as well as the rights of individuals accused of offences and the rights of victims.

225. In 2010, the Ministry of the Attorney General, through the Court Services Division, partnered with the Grand Council of Treaty #3 to deliver “Community Jury Awareness Forums” to fifteen Treaty #3 First Nations located in the Kenora Judicial District. The forums focused on providing outreach and education regarding the jury process. The Grand Council of Treaty #3 expressed an interest in continuing to deliver these information forums and to work with the Ministry of the Attorney General to share information and develop jury lists to address the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll.

226. A similar partnership among the Ministry of the Attorney General, Court Services Division and the Union of Ontario Indians was created in 2009 and 2010. Together, they hosted three Jury Information Forums for the Anishinabek First Nations, which addressed the lack of First Nations candidates on the jury rolls, ways to improve relations, cooperation and trust between Anishinabek First Nations and the Ministry of the Attorney General and Court Services, and how to increase the representation of First Nations peoples in the justice system generally. These Jury Forums appear to have many educational benefits, and the First Nations partners expressed an interest in enhancing and continuing with the Jury Forums.

227. It was also mentioned by many people that government officials, Court Services staff, and police officers who work with First Nations ought to be educated with respect to the circumstances and issues that First Nations people face on a daily basis. In addition to cultural awareness training, it was suggested that all Court Services staff who are involved with ensuring First Nations peoples are represented on the jury roll ought to be trained to undertake their duties in the most effective way possible. It was thought that a better understanding of First Nations peoples would lead to better outcomes all around.

228. Further, education with respect to the justice system in general, and the jury system in particular, needs to take into account the relative youth of the First Nations population in Ontario. As of the 2006 Census, almost half of First Nations people in Ontario were below the age of 24, and almost 30 percent were 14 or younger. In comparison, just 18 percent of Ontarians were 14 or younger, and only approximately 32 percent of Ontarians were 24 or younger.252 The median age for the First Nations population in Ontario is 27.9 years, whereas the median age for the province as a whole is 38.7 years.252

(iv) Self-Government

229. First Nations leaders resoundingly and assertively expressed the desire to assume more control of community justice matters as an element of their inherent right to self-government, and, at the very least, to be involved in developing solutions to the jury representation issue. Having been introduced to community-based restorative justice initiatives in previous years, First Nations experienced the benefits to their communities that came from the development of a culturally appropriate approach to justice. However, these programs were discontinued owing to funding cuts, and therefore will require financial resources and capacity to be resumed. First Nations leaders were unequivocal that re-introducing restorative justice programs would have multiple benefits at the community level. Such benefits include the delivery of justice in a culturally relevant manner, greater understanding of justice at the community level, increased community involvement in the implementation of justice and, finally, an opportunity to educate people about the justice system and their responsibility to become engaged on the juries when called upon to do so.

(v) Policing

230. The issue of local police services arose in many discussions throughout the engagement process. It became very clear that inadequate police services, and associated funding, contribute to negative perceptions of the criminal justice system. Many First Nations were very concerned about the limited and under-resourced police services and the lack of sufficient training for them. Some First Nations leaders expressed frustration regarding the lack of enforcement of First Nation by-laws.
CURRENT PRACTICES FOR COLLECTION OF NAMES AND CONTACT INFORMATION OF FIRST NATIONS PEOPLE ON RESERVE ARE INADEQUATE

231. The majority of First Nations Chiefs and Councillors I spoke to throughout the engagement process were concerned about preserving the confidentiality of band membership lists. The leaders' prevailing concern relates to their obligation to protect the privacy of their citizens. Many took the position that they were obliged to obtain the consent of their citizens before they could disclose personal information such as names, dates of birth, and addresses. Moreover, many Chiefs felt strongly that education about the jury system was a prerequisite to the disclosure of names. They also felt it was unfair to subject their people to what they regard as a completely foreign process.

232. Chiefs also expressed confusion relating to the position taken by Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC) (formerly Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC)) regarding the disclosure of membership lists. At one point in time, INAC was advising First Nations governments to refrain from disclosing any information taken from the Indian Registry System. Recently, AANDC appears to have changed its position, choosing instead to leave the decision to disclose Band Lists to the discretion of individual First Nations.

233. Some First Nations leaders indicated that the lists sought by Court Services officials would not provide the information they were seeking. The band membership lists that are typically requested by Court Services contain the names of all citizens of that First Nation, regardless of whether they live on or off the reserve. Typically, there is no indication of the location of residency for each member. In some instances, the Court Services Division has requested disclosure of the First Nation’s “Electoral” or “Voters” list. I was advised that electoral lists also do not contain the addresses of First Nations citizens. Therefore, there is no list possessed by First Nations that contains the information required by the Court Services Division for the purposes of the jury roll. Specifically, we did not learn of a First Nation possessing a “Residency” list that contains the names and addresses of First Nation citizens resident on the reserve.

234. While a residency list would be ideal for the purposes of the Ontario jury roll, it may not be practical. First Nations have stated that they would have to devote time and resources to assemble such a list. They would require financial capacity to gather and maintain appropriate, accurate and current records, including addresses of all their citizens. Some First Nations I met expressed a willingness to do this if they received funding to do so.

235. Many other First Nations leaders and individuals suggested that the participation of First Nations peoples on juries should be voluntary, particularly considering the social and economic pressures already on their communities. They expressed the view that First Nations’ administrators are best positioned to explore the interest and eligibility of citizens, and accordingly, could be tasked with maintaining a First Nations jury list. They were of the opinion that First Nations would support an option whereby they would enter into an agreement with Ontario to train First Nations administrators to create and maintain lists of names of willing First Nations people for the purposes of the jury roll. From this First Nations jury roll, it was suggested that the Provincial Jury Centre could then randomly draw the names required for the distribution of questionnaires. It was thought that such an approach would be appropriate to address the representation of First Nations’ reserve residents on the jury roll. In addition, I received a very practical suggestion that a First Nations person be staffed in each judicial district to work with First Nations to obtain the information required for the purposes of the jury roll.

236. It has become obvious that the process to obtain the names and addresses of First Nations people on reserve must be clear and consistent throughout all judicial districts wherein First Nations communities are situated. As suggested by a participant in the engagement process, clear guidelines in this respect should be provided to all parties charged with the implementation of section 6(8) of the Juries Act.
(C) JURY QUESTIONNAIRES POSE PROBLEMS AND CONCERNS THAT DETER FIRST NATIONS RESPONSES

237. Many First Nations Chiefs, Councillors, and others raised issues regarding the substance of the jury questionnaire forms. First, the statement of penalty for non-response on the form provides “[i]f you fail to return the form without reasonable excuse within five (5) days of receiving it, or knowingly give false information on the form, you are committing an offence. If convicted of this offence, you may be fined up to $5000.00, or imprisoned up to six (6) months, or both.” First Nations view both the penalty for non-response and the time limit for response as unreasonable, and more importantly, as imposing jury duty through intimidation and threat. It was often expressed that soliciting participation in the jury system by threat of fine and/or imprisonment had the reverse effect and was a strong disincentive to participate. Moreover, we are unaware of any case where an individual was fined or imprisoned or even charged with an offence for failing to respond to a jury questionnaire.

238. The second feature of the jury questionnaire to which First Nations people took considerable exception was the question regarding Canadian citizenship. While it is recognized that being a Canadian citizen is an eligibility requirement to serve as a juror, many First Nations believe very strongly, and are proud of the fact that, they are First Nations citizens. As a result, many First Nations persons who respond to the jury questionnaire answer in the negative, or would answer in the negative, to the Canadian citizenship question. This citizenship issue automatically disqualifies them from having their names entered on the jury roll. It was frequently suggested that if there were an alternative question asking if the respondent was a First Nation citizen or member, they would answer in the affirmative, and therefore not be disqualified from jury service.

239. Third, many First Nations leaders stated that Chiefs and Councillors ought to be included on the list of occupations that are exempted from jury service. It was stated that elected officials do not have the time or ability to be away from their communities and ought to be afforded the same exemption as other elected officials throughout Canada.

240. Fourth, I heard repeatedly that language poses a considerable obstacle. Requiring fluency in English or French as an eligibility requirement for jury service is problematic for many whose spoken language is their First Nation language. I spoke with many First Nations people who stated that if Ontario seeks their participation on juries, it ought to accommodate people who speak First Nations languages by equipping juries with translation services, if necessary. Moreover, the lack of translation of jury questionnaires and accompanying instructions pose challenges to First Nations people in completing the jury questionnaire forms.

241. Lastly, many First Nations participants in the engagement process expressed a lack of understanding of the jury selection process and role of juries, which in turn served as a barrier to responding to jury questionnaires. It was noted that confusion and misunderstandings often arise when a person is called for jury selection but not chosen for jury service, with no follow-up communication from the Court Services Division. It is likely that negative messages are passed to other people in the community, which potentially has an adverse impact on their future interest in responding to jury questionnaires.

(D) PRACTICAL BARRIERS TO JURY PARTICIPATION

242. In addition to all of the aforementioned obstacles, there exist some very real logistical barriers that First Nations peoples, particularly in northwestern Ontario, must overcome to participate on juries. Transportation from reserve communities to the urban centres is a significant challenge in a number of ways. Travel to urban centres often requires multiple modes of transportation that can take up to several days. The cost for airfare far exceeds what people can afford out-of-pocket. While the Court Services Division in the Kenora judicial district pre-arranges travel, accommodation and meal allowances for potential First Nations jurors, my understanding is that this service is not consistently offered in other judicial districts.
First Nations leaders expressed the opinion that all expenses related to the jury selection process or jury service must therefore be paid prior to travel to urban centres because of lack of resources and available credit.

243. First Nations people also noted that accommodations and meal allowances are not adequate. It was reported that hotels were substandard and meal stipends did not allow for healthy meal options. Concerns were also raised with respect to lack of translation services for people who travel to the urban centre where their dominant language is a First Nation language. Because the jury selection process and jury services require First Nations people to be away from their communities for several days, it was noted that childcare and Elder care expenses ought to be included as a necessary expense, or preferably, children and Elders ought to accompany the potential juror on an expense-paid basis. Moreover, for those potential jurors who are employed, First Nations people felt strongly that income supplements should be available. The First Nations people, with whom I spoke who had experienced jury service, expressed the need for community-based supports, such as assistance with process logistics, as well as services for psychological impacts that may arise following jury service.

244. Finally, First Nations people identified that the existence of criminal records, and lack of awareness of pardon procedures, present a significant bar to jury service. They explained that some First Nations people have old criminal records, many for minor offences, that excuse them from being eligible for jury service. However, owing to the lack of information and costs associated with pardon procedures, most do not expunge their criminal record, choosing to live with it instead.

(E) CORONER’S INQUESTS

245. The importance of coroner’s inquests was emphasized by the families involved in coroner’s inquests and by leaders and other people I met. Many First Nations people are dying while in state care, and a fear was expressed that the number of deaths will rise, simply by the excessive number of First Nations people in penal institutions and the child welfare system. It was explained to me that First Nations people understand, better than non-First Nations people, the systemic and historic issues that are engrained in the justice system, which often come into play in these tragedies. Therefore, ensuring the representation of First Nations peoples on coroner’s juries is viewed to be integral to the proper resolution and prevention of future tragedies that involve First Nations peoples.

246. Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto hosted a Families Forum – a gathering of family members who had been or were involved in coroner’s inquests to examine the circumstances of a death while in state care. The main concerns expressed by the participants related to the composition of the juries and their lack of representativeness of any First Nations peoples, and the delays associated with the inquest. Families have been waiting for as many as five years to move forward with the inquests. Admittedly, much of this delay is associated with the lack of resolution of the issue of underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on coroner’s juries. While this issue is being addressed in the courts, coroner’s inquests are placed into abeyance, and the families are prevented from obtaining answers and the necessary closure in a timely manner.

247. Christa Big Canoe, Legal Advocacy Director at ALST, emphatically expressed this point: “The only thing these people ask for is fairness, not special treatment”. That should be an attainable goal for everyone involved.
(F) RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE MINISTRY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND FIRST NATIONS WITH RESPECT TO THE JURY ROLL NEEDS TO BE IMPROVED

248. Every First Nation individual I met unequivocally asserted that the way forward with respect to enhancing a relationship with the Ministry of the Attorney General in the context of the jury system, and all justice matters, is through a government-to-government process. First Nations want to assume greater control of the justice system as it applies to their people and communities and rely upon their traditional approaches to justice as the preferred approach. First Nations recall the restorative justice programs that were initiated in a previous era and look to build upon those as a means to reclaim authority and responsibility over the delivery of justice to their people. They strongly believe that diverting First Nations people from the criminal justice system to a traditional system of healing and reconciliation will have many benefits that will ultimately trickle down to the jury roll process. Therefore, First Nations advocate for adequate funding to support community-based justice initiatives aimed at enhancing participation on juries in a culturally appropriate manner, and to return to the implementation of First Nations restorative justice initiatives.

249. First Nations view Ontario and Canada’s investment in First Nations restorative justice programs as also benefitting the criminal justice system. Consistent with a restorative justice approach, First Nations people expressed the need for collaboration between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations in developing a proper jury roll selection process. A family member who attended the Families Forum, discussed above, suggested a pragmatic step in this direction; the Attorney General should host a meeting with First Nations leadership to consider ways to implement section 6(8) of the Juries Act. Such a meeting would signal a positive step towards improving the relationship between the Attorney General and First Nations, particularly with respect to the jury system. On a broader level, it was also suggested that the Attorney General create a “Round Table” on Aboriginal People and Justice to design, develop, and implement an Aboriginal Justice system.

250. It became abundantly clear throughout the engagement process that education and awareness among First Nations people in relation to the jury system for both trials and coroner’s inquests is a priority and would serve to improve the relationship. Increased education about the process for pardons and access to support services for First Nations are required. Likewise, First Nations are insistent that increased education, including cultural sensitivity training, is also required for Court Services and policing officials regarding First Nations culture, values, and traditions.

251. In the words of former Chief Jonathan Solomon Sr. of Kashechewan, “it is up to the Attorney General of Ontario to close the ‘Knowing and Doing Gap’”.

2. MEETINGS WITH GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND THE JUDICIARY

252. During the engagement process for the Independent Review, my legal team and I also met and spoke with officials from the Ministry of the Attorney General, Court Services Division, the Provincial Jury Centre, Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care, the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth, and members of the judiciary who were involved in increasing the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll. We obtained helpful information regarding the role of the key actors in compiling the jury roll. We also heard a consensus view among government officials that improvements are necessary to substantially increase the participation of First Nations reserve residents on the jury roll.

253. Most of the information I learned from government officials and members of the judiciary about the compilation of the jury roll in Ontario and efforts to improve the representation of First Nations persons on the jury roll has already been described by me in Part III under the sections entitled the “Jury Selection Process as it Currently Operates in Ontario” and “First Nations Representation on Ontario Juries”, and I will not repeat those descriptions here.
254. As discussed in those sections, at present, the manner in which potential First Nations jurors are identified is ad hoc and contingent upon the efforts made by court staff to connect with First Nations, and ultimately the decisions of First Nations to exercise their discretion to disclose a list of reserve residents. This ad hoc system has proven to be ineffective and results in a jury roll that is unrepresentative of all First Nations peoples on reserve. Accordingly, obtaining the names of First Nations residents on reserve in each judicial district in accordance with section 6(8) of the Juries Act in a consistent, reliable, and uniform manner is a core problem. Equally, if not even more important to achieving a representative jury roll is identifying effective ways to encourage the participation of First Nations peoples in the jury system once adequate lists or records are obtained that provide a reliable data source for First Nations reserve residents.

255. As I described above, until 2001, the Provincial Jury Centre obtained Band Lists from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development through the Indian Registry System. It is the position of the federal Department that its decision to refrain from further disclosure of Band Lists following 2000 came at the request of First Nations, coupled with a review of the information-sharing agreement between Ontario and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the application of the new Privacy Act. In 2007 and 2009, the Federal Department was advising First Nations against disclosing information from the Indian Registry System to third parties. However, it is the Department’s current position that each First Nation may exercise its discretion to disclose their Band Lists to Ontario for the purposes of the jury roll.

256. I understand that the Court Services Division has considered, but not seriously pursued, the option of obtaining names of First Nations persons living on reserve from the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care. Officials of the Ministry of the Attorney General with whom we spoke expressed the view that using the Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) database is not an ideal option for the collection of names of First Nations people on reserve for a number of reasons. First, gaining access to the OHIP database will require legislative and regulatory change and trigger a First Nations consultation process and, hence, be a lengthy pursuit. Second, the database does not contain a First Nations identifier and therefore may not be overly helpful in identifying persons living on reserve. Third, the reliability of the OHIP database is somewhat compromised by the existence of a relatively large number of fraudulent cards.

257. However, our discussions with officials within the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care suggested that the OHIP database could possibly be an important additional data source of names for the jury roll. While it was acknowledged that there is no First Nations indicator in the database, searches could yield success using the proper search criteria, such as postal codes and date range. Because the new OHIP cards must be renewed, cardholders are generally required to keep their cards and information current in order to access health services. However, it was acknowledged that the proper analysis and data polling must be undertaken to test the adequacy of the search results. With respect to disclosure of information for the purposes of the jury roll, the official with whom we spoke cautioned that the Ministry would also have to explore its legal obligations in this regard. In any event, the OHIP database, coupled potentially with information-sharing agreements or memorandum of understanding, is an avenue worthy of further exploration.

258. As described above, court officials in the Kenora District, and more recently Thunder Bay, have undertaken various efforts to reach out to First Nations to obtain residence information and have undertaken programs to educate and inform First Nations communities about the jury system. A recent example, as mentioned earlier, is the initiative of the Ministry of the Attorney General, Court Services Division in the Kenora Judicial District, the Grand Council of Treaty #3, and the Union of Ontario Indians to deliver Jury

Information Forums in a total of 15 First Nations communities in 2010 and 2011. The reports that resulted from these Jury Forums contain useful recommendations for improvements. At the Red Rock First Nation, a community person was trained and hired to undertake a door-to-door campaign to educate people on the jury process. Beginning in 2008, jury questionnaires were produced in syllabics for First Nations people fluent only in their indigenous language. In addition, a First Nations court translator and liaison person was hired in the Kenora office to provide assistance to Court Services in its outreach efforts. It is precisely these types of initiatives, among others undertaken, that are critical to provide regular and on-going education, information, and encouragement to First Nations people on reserve with respect to jury service in the effort to create the annual jury roll.

259. I was also very interested to learn of the project undertaken in Thunder Bay to construct a new Court House with an Aboriginal Hearing Room that will be a symbolic and respectful centerpiece of the new Court House. I understand that the process to conceptualize, develop, and construct the Aboriginal Hearing room has involved First Nations people and Elders from the outset and that every First Nations protocol was honoured and followed. This is an important initiative that I would hope will provide a culturally appropriate space for First Nations people to participate in Ontario’s justice system, and will go some way toward beginning to ameliorate some of the problems described above.

260. It was acknowledged by all with whom we met that the key to addressing the issue of representation of First Nations peoples on juries is significant collaboration and communication between First Nations leadership and the Ministry of the Attorney General. It was stressed that solutions must be sufficiently flexible to accommodate regional circumstances and distinctions, while providing certainty of process. For example, some suggested that alternatives to jury selection process should be explored, such as a video conferencing for jury selection. It was also proposed that consideration be given to trials conducted by the Superior Court of Justice in select First Nations communities, similar to the Provincial Courts. Finally, it was suggested that Superior Court judges could be provided with discretion to require a minimum quantum of First Nations jurors for criminal trials.

C. SUBMISSIONS

1. NAN SUBMISSIONS

261. NAN and its legal team were key participants in the community engagement process carried out as part of the Independent Review. Following the community dialogue sessions, NAN prepared submissions for my consideration, which are divided into six parts.

262. Part I is an introduction of NAN as a political organization and its role in the Independent Review, as previously described in this Report. In its general overview of the problem of the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples in Ontario’s jury system, NAN quite rightly states that the issue “is but one symptom of a larger problem of alienation and exclusion of First Nations people within the justice system”.256 Addressing criminal justice in Northern Ontario has been a priority for NAN.

263. In Northern Ontario there are four judicial districts for which jury rolls are prepared: Kenora, Thunder Bay, Timmins, and Cochrane. Various First Nations associated with NAN are situated in each of these districts. NAN explains that of the 46 First Nations situated in the Kenora judicial district, 30 of them fall under NAN’s organizational umbrella. Of these, I visited with the leadership and citizens of seven First Nations. In the Thunder Bay judicial district, four of the 15 First Nations are part of NAN. I also visited with First Nations in the Timmins and Cochrane judicial districts for a total of 10 First Nations associated with NAN.

264. Part II of NAN’s submissions describe the recent litigation in Ontario regarding the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll in Ontario. I have previously addressed these cases in Part II and Part III of this Report.

265. Part III of NAN’s Submissions advocates for a “Charter-based approach to jury representativeness”. The crux of NAN’s proposal is that the approach to comply with section 6(8) of the Juries Act ought to focus on obtaining the proper number of First Nations peoples on the jury roll, rather than on ensuring court officials make “reasonable efforts”, exercise due diligence, or possess good intentions to include on-reserve First Nations peoples on the jury roll. NAN submits that the results-based approach will require the Attorney General to address the broader systemic issues affecting First Nations peoples and the justice system, which are inextricably linked to the low response rate to jury questionnaires and ultimately the lack of representativeness of the jury roll. Moreover, such an approach in NAN’s view will also foster the development of a respectful relationship between First Nations and the Attorney General.

266. NAN submits that First Nations’ historic experiences with the Government’s actions grounded in “good intentions” have resulted in catastrophic legal and policy developments that have contributed to the disadvantages faced by First Nations people. Therefore, the government’s “good intentions” should be avoided in addressing the underrepresentation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries. For example, they refer to the Indian Residential Schools policy, and early provisions of the Indian Act, which prohibited Indians from leaving reserves without the permission of the Indian Agent, prohibited Indians from hiring lawyers, and banished sacred ceremonies.

267. Part IV of NAN’s submissions focuses on the practical and cultural barriers to participation on juries faced by First Nations peoples. NAN outlines eight barriers to the representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries, which are substantively similar to what we heard in the engagement sessions and are essentially aligned with what I have discussed in the previous section. Rather than being repetitive, I will provide a brief overview of the perspectives on these matters from NAN and the various people we met.

268. Cultural barriers. This first obstacle emerges from the conflict between First Nations’ cultural values, traditional laws, and norms, and the Euro-Canadian principles and values that underlie the Canadian justice system. First Nations’ cultural values and teachings prevent people who live by those values and teachings from judging the conduct and behavior of others, thereby instilling a strong sense of reticence to participate in juries for criminal trials. NAN quotes Chief Adam Fiddler from the Sandy Lake First Nation:

One of the reasons our people don’t want to be on the jury, it goes against our values. It also goes against the Bible. There are teachings from the Bible that we cannot judge others. Also it’s part of our traditional values. We cannot judge somebody. We have our own traditional ways of dealing with issues... You cannot tell someone what to do, and you cannot judge them. To judge them is wrong. The idea of sitting on the jury and judge whether what they did is acceptable or not is wrong. There is a fear of that. That is one aspect of it... On the one hand, we are arguing to be part of the jury, but our fundamental belief system is that we don’t want to be part of it. We struggle with it.257

269. However, it was observed that given the non-retributive nature of coroner’s inquests and the potential effect of the juries’ recommendations to change policies, First Nations people would not encounter the same cultural contradiction. Joe Meekis from the Keewaywin First Nation articulated succinctly:

Coroners inquests are very important for us. We need to take part in those sessions. We have heard people talk about those cases. These cases affect our communities deeply; our kids who die in that river. I cannot express how important it is. We have to be included in those juries. That is very important.258

257 Ibid., at page 30.
270. NAN representatives observed that significant changes to the justice system and its relationship with First Nations could have a correlative impact on First Nations’ views regarding participation on juries.

271. Justice system is an alien system. First Nations people do not view the Canadian justice system as a positive presence in their lives. They view it as a foreign system of imposition that has subjugated traditional and more peaceful and culturally driven approaches to resolving conflict. First Nations view themselves as objects of the criminal justice system rather than meaningful partners and participants in it. Chief Eno Anderson of Kassibonika Lake First Nation was eloquent in his vision for a justice system that reflects First Nations’ cultural norms:

Until they incorporate our principles, our understanding, our values, we won’t accept it... It will feel foreign. Like a stranger coming into our community. Until we have a structure that we are part of. If we are part of it, we will support it... We want a justice system that can resolve problems, not a justice system that takes away our people.259

272. Mistrust of police/authorities. Consistently negative experiences encountered by First Nations people with respect to the police and other authorities compound their negative perceptions of the criminal justice system. This experience has a direct correlation to the lack of interest in participating in the jury system, as described by Chief Roger Wesley of Constance Lake First Nation:

That’s what has to change – we have to have a fair opportunity. Fair. Fair justice would be something new to this province, because it doesn’t exist for First Nations people... Take note, the system is fundamentally flawed for these people. As a leader of this community, it’s tough to see young men and women being put through the process and never feeling like they had a chance.260

273. The level of mistrust is exacerbated by the directive language used in the jury forms, which is perceived as a threat of jail or fines for failure to respond to a jury questionnaire. Joe Meekis of the Keewaywin First Nation summed up a constant theme of the engagement sessions: “[w]hy stretch out your hand if you are going to hit the guy? Not a good way to ask for help.”261

274. “Conveyor belt” for guilty pleas. First Nations participants from community to community repeatedly identified numerous systemic and serious problems with the way in which justice is delivered in Northern Ontario, which more often than not result in guilty pleas, as described in Part IV, Section A of this Report. One citizen from Mattagami First Nation stated, “[n]ot once has [friends or family] made it to trial. They always plead guilty. Guilty, Guilty, Guilty.”262

275. There is a real perception that the justice system simply does not care about First Nations peoples and the reciprocal effect is that First Nations people refuse to participate in any aspect of the justice system. Chief Connie Gray MacKay of the Mishkeegogamang First Nation provided a powerful, yet disturbing, depiction of a typical day in court in Pickle Lake:

259 Ibid., at 31-32.
260 Ibid., at 32.
261 Ibid., at 33.
262 Ibid., at 35.
Any client who wants to talk to their lawyer, it happens in the kitchen. The judge changes in the library. The lawyers don’t have a room they can interview people in, if the kitchen is full and the bar is full, so there is no privacy, no confidentiality. There is a makeshift wall inside the courtroom, so you can have a meeting there, or you are meeting alongside of the walls. It’s a whole shaming process, there is no privacy for anyone… Something has to change, it’s no longer acceptable.263

276. These experiences undermine respect for the judicial process and are counterproductive to enhancing jury participation.

277. Practical obstacles to jury participation in remote communities. The geographical and socio-economic realities of First Nations in the North give rise to significant challenges to jury participation. As discussed in Part IV, Section B of this Report, NAN maintains that these logistical and funding matters must be addressed to encourage First Nations people to participate on juries.

278. Lack of education concerning the jury system. Many participants in the engagement sessions were profoundly unfamiliar with the justice system in general, and the jury system in particular. Based on the accounts from First Nations people, it was equally clear that the justice system and its actors require substantial education about First Nations peoples. Following our meeting, the Kassabonika Lake First Nation provided written submissions that summarized this issue succinctly:

> People are reluctant to serve [on juries] when they do not understand or trust the system... Just as there is a need for the justice system to be better informed and educated, there is a need for community education and awareness about the justice system. Elements such as the role and relationships of jurors need to be taught and understood. Information should be translated into the aboriginal language of the community; including jury notices.264

279. Criminal records disqualify many First Nations people from participating in juries. First Nations peoples’ prior convictions represent a substantial barrier to the participation on Ontario juries; a barrier which will only increase with recent amendments to the Criminal Code that make it more difficult to obtain pardons to absolve a person’s criminal record.

280. Lack of respect for First Nations leadership. The manner in which some court officials attempt to obtain band or electoral lists from First Nations is perceived as inappropriate and lacking a respectful protocol that is owed to elected First Nations leadership. An anecdote was provided of a situation in which a court official sought to obtain names from an administrative assistant after a Chief refused to disclose a list. Most, if not all, of the First Nations leaders spoke of their duty to respect and protect the privacy rights of the people they represent.

281. Part V of NAN’s Systemic Submissions address the role of the Nishnawbe Aski Legal Services Corporation (NALSC) in the delivery of justice in Northern Ontario. NALSC was created in 1990 as a result of collaboration between NAN and Legal Aid Ontario to address justice issues in the North. It delivers the Legal Aid Plan in Treaty 9 and Treaty 5 territories, provides public legal education, and carries out law reform initiatives, such as restorative justice programs, in the areas of criminal and child welfare law. Its programs are funded by an array of public funders.

282. NAN acknowledges serious limitations associated with NALSC’s program delivery, in that it is unable to offer the full scope of services to all NAN communities owing to funding constraints. NAN proposes that if the restorative justice programs were properly resourced, NALSC would be better positioned to meet its objective of diverting a majority of criminal matters to restorative justice, enabling First Nations

264 Ibid., at 36.
to move towards a culturally specific justice model. NAN also proposes that adequate funding be provided for NALSC’s public education mandate to help First Nations people in NAN communities understand the justice system and the role of juries therein, and to provide the support necessary to assist potential First Nation jurors in their participation.

283. In Part VI of its Systemic Submissions, NAN sets out broad areas on which, in its view, the Report of the Independent Review ought to focus its recommendations.

284. Implementation: combating skepticism of the review process. NAN proposes that the Report recommend the creation of an implementation process that identifies the institution or department that would carry the responsibility for implementing a particular recommendation, with measurable benchmarks within a reasonable time frame. As well, NAN proposes that a reporting mechanism be included in the recommendations to update First Nations, the public, and the courts.

285. Ownership: enhancement of restorative justice programs. NAN states that the way forward to reconcile competing worldviews regarding justice is to foster long-term participation of First Nations peoples in, and ownership of, the justice system. NAN proposes that this reconciliation can be achieved by creating partnerships within First Nations on self-governance and justice, and making necessary room for legal plurality and the existence of dual justice systems. The existing approach in Sandy Lake First Nation and Attiwapiskat First Nation of enabling Elders to sit with the provincial court judge has proved beneficial, despite the withdrawal of funding to support this activity.

286. Reparations: improvements to the justice system. NAN proposes that the government make significant investments to improve the operation of the justice system in northwest Ontario. Discussions with First Nations have exposed a system that fails at its most rudimentary level and has lost the confidence, trust and respect of First Nations people generally. NAN argues that unless the overall justice system is addressed, there is no prospect for redressing the under-representation of First Nations peoples on juries. Therefore, it urges the Independent Review to highlight the most pressing issues and propose recommendations for a process to address the basic failings of the system. NAN outlines some of these key needs:

- increased frequency of court sittings, and, in consultation with First Nations leadership, explore the feasibility of holding jury trials in remote communities;
- appropriate infrastructure for court hearings;
- adequate legal representation and a review of the Legal Aid system in the North;
- properly trained language interpreters; and
- adequate funding for the accused and their witnesses to properly access the justice system.

287. Relationships: the creation of provincial-level infrastructure to manage the inclusion of First Nations people on the jury roll. NAN proposes the development of infrastructure to manage a comprehensive province-wide process to include on-reserve First Nations residents on the jury roll. Such an approach will promote the implementation of section 6(8) of the Juries Act in a systematic and consistent manner throughout Ontario. NAN proposes that the elements of this process should include:

- affixing accountability for the implementation of section 6(8) with the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Attorney General, rather than local court officials, to ensure the appropriate expertise is used, adequate resources are committed and reporting is mandated;
- developing solutions through partnerships created that respect a government-to-government relationship; and
- collecting, analyzing, and monitoring the statistics of jury questionnaires and implementing remedial measures, as necessary.
288. Involvement: First Nations participations in juror enumeration. NAN recommends that First Nations governments be given the opportunity to become directly involved in juror enumeration. NAN argues that this approach would enhance the eligible return rate of questionnaires sent to First Nations and, therefore, actual representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll. The solution to enhancing actual representation does not lie in increasing the number of jury questionnaires sent to First Nations people, but rather in outreach and self-selection of those individuals who have the ability, willingness, and capacity to serve as jurors. NAN argues that as long as a sufficient number of suitable candidates are enumerated, the fundamental principle of randomness would not be offended. NAN states that the subsequent safeguards of the out-of-court and in-court jury selection process would preempt any legal challenges of impartiality of the jury. Finally, NAN submits that any approach to enumeration should respect principles of autonomy; involving First Nations in an enumeration process must be consensual and participation of individual jurors should be voluntary.

289. Support: ensuring the participation of First Nations peoples on juries. During the engagement process, meeting First Nations people who served on a jury was not common. However, there were a number of individuals who received jury questionnaires. Of these people, most expressed confusion, concerns respecting the content of the forms, and fear regarding penalties for not responding. As a result of this feedback, NAN proposes five measures that are aimed at providing the necessary support to garner participation of First Nations peoples on juries.

- Public legal education should be carried out for First Nations people regarding the jury system and the role of jurors. It should be developed in consultation with First Nations governments and organizations. Likewise, an education initiative is required for officials of the Court Services Division regarding First Nations peoples and cultural and political protocols to reduce alienating interactions.

- Contact policies and practices should be renewed to transform the manner in which court officials initiate contact with First Nations with a view to soliciting voluntary participation, rather than coerced participation. Additional support resources in the form of a contact person within the Court Services Division would assist in clarifying questions regarding the process.

- Travel and income supports ought to be enhanced to alleviate the hardship of traveling. Such supports could take the form of increased financial resources or implementing video conferencing or other similar technology to reduce travel for the jury selection process. Where travel is required, a designated person from the local Court Services Division office should make all the necessary arrangements for travel. Enhanced income supports are required for matters such as childcare and Elder care responsibilities.

- Interpretation services for First Nations jurors would enhance the potential for participation. NAN also suggests amending the Juries Act to include a First Nations language as a qualifying criterion to jury eligibility, which would be aligned with the official languages recognized by the Official Languages Act.

- Exclusions based on criminal record could be addressed through an amendment to the Juries Act that aligns prohibited criminal offences with specific offences contained in the Criminal Code.

2. UNION OF ONTARIO INDIANS SUBMISSIONS

290. The Union of the Ontario Indians is an advocate for 39 Anishinabek First Nations in Ontario with an approximate population of 55,000 First Nations persons. The Union was incorporated by the Anishinabek Nation in 1949 and is comprised of four regional areas represented by respective Regional Chiefs.

291. We received three main groups of submissions from the Union. First, the Union provided a comprehensive set of submissions following the engagement process addressing nine areas that require improvements and advance recommendations in this regard. Second, the Union provided us with its report entitled “Juries are a Circle of Justice,” which it prepared following the Jury Information Forums conducted in 2009, which I described above at paragraph 226 of the Report. Third, the Union commissioned three independent papers that address the issue of the representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries. I briefly discuss each of these submissions below.

(A) SUBMISSIONS FOLLOWING ENGAGEMENT PROCESS

292. The Union in its submissions identifies three prevailing messages that arose from the engagement process. First, Anishinabek First Nations are generally apathetic about becoming involved in the jury system because it is a part of a larger justice system that is perceived as foreign, unfair, and devoid of Anishinabek values and interests. Second, Anishinabek First Nations prefer to develop and implement their own justice-related institutions as a means to reduce the number of people in jail, which will in turn increase confidence in the justice system. Examples of these institutions include the police, diversion and restorative justice programs, court workers, and courts. Third, in order to encourage the participation of First Nations peoples on juries, Ontario should take steps to improve the justice system, including increasing cultural competency in the courts and providing more public education to First Nations communities on the role of juries and the associated processes.

293. First Nations justice projects. The Union reports that its First Nations members view the development of community justice projects as a partnership between First Nations and the justice system. In addition to diverting First Nations individuals from penal institutions and promoting healing and recovery, these projects have a positive impact on First Nations because they enable them to rebuild jurisdiction over their own affairs. On the broader scale, community justice projects reduce fear, confusion, and distaste that First Nations currently have for the justice system. Therefore, this recommendation has twin benefits of improving the relationship of First Nations and the justice system, while empowering the communities to address justice issues that affect them.

294. The Union recommends that Ontario provide additional funding and support for community justice programs and related work.

295. Policing. The Union reports that First Nations police programs positively contribute to First Nations’ relationship with law enforcement. However, currently First Nations policing is a discretionary program, not secured by enabling legislation, so its existence and funding are vulnerable to elimination. The Union recommends that Ontario and Canada work collaboratively to develop First Nations Policing legislation, or preferably, fund First Nations to develop their own policing laws.

296. The Union submits that certain tangible measures should be taken to improve First Nations police services and enhance public confidence in their delivery. First, it suggests that a regulatory body be established to oversee the operation of First Nations law enforcement programs. Second, because there is currently no mechanism to review inappropriate conduct, the Union proposes the creation of an independent review board to adjudicate complaints. The Union suggests that the Office of the Independent Police Review Director could be involved in this initiative. Finally, it recommends that OPP officers receive mandatory cultural competency training, including in the areas of First Nations’ rights, laws, and by-law enforcement.

297. Health. The Union’s Women’s Council hold strong beliefs that the overrepresentation of First Nations peoples in Ontario jails is largely attributable to health issues generated over the years by the historic injustices endured by First Nations peoples. They propose that health supports be available both inside and outside of penal institutions to those offenders who require it. Specifically, the Union recommends that Ontario increase funding to First Nations administrations for programs and services to address physical and mental health issues. It also recommends that provincial penal institutions increase rehabilitation services available to offenders while in custody and during the parole process, and suggests that these services be monitored by a civilian oversight committee.

298. Education. The Union states that informing and educating First Nations people on justice matters generally, and the jury system specifically, will dispel many misunderstandings and encourage First Nations people to participate in the jury process. The Union recommends that educational efforts be creatively designed and implemented in collaboration with tribal councils, Provincial Treaty Organizations or other regional organizations. To specifically target youth, the Union proposes that Ontario and Canada develop a school curriculum regarding the justice system, including the jury process as it relates to First Nations peoples living on reserves.

299. The Union also emphasizes the importance of clarifying the privacy issues concerning disclosure of electoral lists or other information regarding band membership, and sharing this information with First Nations leadership.

300. Racism and special circumstances. Many First Nations individuals believe that racist misconceptions and assumptions permeate the justice system – from policing to courts to the penal institutions. As one measure to address these issues, the Union recommends the implementation of mandatory cultural competency training for police, court workers, Crown prosecutors, prison guards and employees, the Office of the Children’s Lawyer, and Children’s Aid Society workers. The Union also recommends that consideration be given to incorporating into the criminal justice system the opportunity for a First Nations accused to raise special circumstances – as currently provided during sentencing in accordance with the Supreme Court of Canada’s Gladue decision – prior to sentencing and as early as his or her first court appearance.

301. Juries. To instill greater confidence in the justice system and increase the willingness of First Nations people to participate on juries, the Union proposes that Ontario make concerted efforts to increase the number of First Nations judges appointed to the bench, especially to appellate courts. The Union also recommends that the Attorney General investigate alternatives to the current system that allows potential jurors to be removed by a challenge for cause, challenges which may be sometimes motivated by racist intent.

302. Travel and expenses. The socio-economic conditions of most First Nations reserves, the great distance between reserves and courts locations, and the in-court jury selection process are serious disincentives and barriers to jury participation, particularly for a lengthy jury trial. To alleviate some of these obstacles, the Union recommends a drastic increase in the compensation rates for jurors, including those who are required to appear for selection but are excused. Concurrently, the Union proposes that the Attorney General explore options to convene court proceedings on First Nations reserves, where possible.

303. Options for improving and updating jury rolls. Although some First Nations people appreciate their civic duty to serve on juries, encouraging Chiefs and Councils to share information with Court Services is the challenge. In recommending a variety of options, the Union stresses that a “one size fits all” approach is not an appropriate way to obtain lists from First Nations. The Union recommends the consideration of an “opt in” process whereby individual First Nations people would volunteer to serve. The Union also suggests including an ongoing plebiscite on the electoral ballots cast by individual voters that poses a question as to whether the community agrees to share their membership or residency list. Finally, the Union again suggests that juror compensation be increased to serve as an economic inducement to an otherwise impoverished demographic.

304. Coroner’s inquests. The fact that a jury for a coroner’s inquest is selected from the same jury roll as juries for criminal trials is something that is unknown to most people who participated in the engagement process. This type of information could motivate First Nations leadership to disclose Band Lists and to work with Court Services to ensure that coroner’s inquests into First Nations deaths are convened in a timely manner. An assertive educational campaign would serve to inform First Nations leadership of the benefits of disclosing lists for the preparation of the jury roll. The nature of a coroner’s inquest is also a motivating factor for potential First Nations jurors, who would see it as an opportunity to take part in making recommendations for change.
305. The Union recommends that Ontario educate First Nations Chiefs and Councils regarding the importance of jury rolls generally, and the representation of First Nations peoples on coroner’s inquests specifically. It suggests that Ontario partner with tribal councils and PTOs in their education efforts to maximize effectiveness. It also suggests that Ontario consider separating jury rolls for criminal trials and coroner’s inquests to ensure the participation of First Nations peoples in the latter.

(B) SUBMISSIONS FOLLOWING JURY INFORMATION FORUMS -- “JURIES ARE A CIRCLE OF JUSTICE”

306. As previously explained, the Union partnered with the Ministry of the Attorney General in 2009 to deliver Jury Information Forums to the First Nations associated with the Union. Following those Forums, the Union prepared a report that contained the following recommendations.

Ways to increase the number of First Nations jurors

• For the purposes of the jury roll, the Anishinabek Nation and Ministry of Attorney General should negotiate an agreement to develop a process to obtain Band Lists and establish protocols for the use, protection and storage of the information.

• Organize Jury Information Forums in all 40 Anishinabek First Nations.

• The Ministry and the Anishinabek Nation should work collaboratively to develop a promotional strategy for dissemination of information regarding the jury process.

• Create the position of Anishinabek Nation Sheriff, or a similar role, who would liaise with First Nations and compile the jury roll.

• Develop a distinct process for the selection of First Nations jurors within which First Nations would be charged with selecting potential jurors for the jury roll.

Procedural Recommendations

• Develop a jury summons form specific to Anishinabek First Nations and produce it in the First Nations languages of Odawa, Ojibway, Delaware, Pottawatomi, Chippewa, Algonquin and Mississauga.

• Provide translation services in the First Nations languages.

• Remove the references to penalties for non-response on the jury form.

• Provide an option to identify First Nations citizenship on the jury form.

• Remove the requirement for Anishinabek jurors to swear an oath on the Bible or take an oath to be a juror.

• Provide nominal remuneration for jury duty.

• Provide for travel expenses for all potential jurors who are required to attend the selection process, regardless of whether they are selected for duty or reside within a certain radius of the courthouse.

• Provide culturally appropriate aftercare treatment for jurors who require it.

Ontario Justice System

• Provide information and assistance to those First Nations citizens who want to obtain a pardon for past criminal offences.
Appoint a liaison person to work with Anishinabek First Nations to provide information about the Ontario justice system and to provide support for jury summons forms and related documentation.

Enhance funding for the Aboriginal Court Worker program and First Nations justice workers to support offenders.

C INDEPENDENT PAPERS COMMISSIONED BY THE UNION

307. Paper by Elder Ernie Sandy. In his paper, “Recommendations from First Nation Citizens in Ontario Justice System”, Elder Ernie Sandy interviewed many First Nations people and made recommendations based on what he learned. The views he heard reflected the recurring theme that First Nations people were uninterested in serving on juries because their experiences and perceptions of the justice system were pugnacious, negative, colonial and contrary to their core cultural beliefs. That being said, he stated that some expressed curiosity towards the jury system. Mr. Sandy made the following recommendations.

Education and Outreach

- Develop outreach programs regarding the jury selection process to be delivered in First Nations communities by First Nations justice workers. The focus of these programs should be to educate First Nations citizens about the importance in serving on a jury and could be promoted with the use of a slogan. For example, “You can make a difference in someone’s life as a jury member”.
- Develop a comprehensive “First Nation culture and historical awareness” sensitivity program delivered, with the assistance of Elders and guest speakers, to key personnel and justice lawyers who work closely with First Nations citizens.
- The Attorney General’s office should host a conference on the jury system that is aligned with the timing for major political gatherings in the province.
- Produce a video that explains the jury system in a First Nations context and emphasizes the importance of participation, to be used as an education tool in schools and for the purposes of informing First Nations people generally.
- Encourage “kitchen table” dialogue between court workers, leadership, and First Nations community members with an emphasis that no formal education is required to sit on a jury.
- Create a juror orientation program to prepare individuals for the jury selection process.

Accessibility

- Encourage First Nations citizens to actively pursue their right to sit on a jury, even if excluded through the selection process.

Eligibility

- Request a list of the names of eligible First Nations individuals from the federal department of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development.

Relationship Building

- Establish a First Nations citizen advisory body within the Attorney General’s office. Through this process, mutual admiration of each other’s professional, cultural and personal qualities can be fostered.

308. Paper by Elder Mike Esquega Sr. (Northern Superior Regional Elder). The central message of Mr. Esquega’s submission is that improvements to the justice system for Anishinabek citizens may increase their willingness to participate in the jury system.268

309. Mr. Esquega recommends that Ontario develop and implement an action plan to acknowledge, support and provide accommodations for First Nations people to participate in the jury process. This plan should include the following elements:

- a process to educate and consult with First Nations individuals when they are subpoenaed to the jury selection process;
- the use of ceremony in the court process, including jury selection;
- consideration of a minimum mandatory number of First Nations citizens (or a full panel);
- a support system for those attending the selection processes;
- oversight of the selection process to ensure its fairness; and
- provisions to respond to financial and cultural concerns, such as considering holding court in the community of an accused person or a neighbouring First Nation.

310. Mr. Esquega also recommends that Ontario enter into a Protocol Agreement with First Nations to ensure that continuous and meaningful consultations occur with First Nations with respect to changes to the justice system, and that an educational campaign be implemented. He recommends that the consultations to be held with Chiefs and Councils, as well as with citizens, through forums provided by the Union of Ontario Indians and other organizations, and that the consultations should include women, youth, and elders, and produce a discussions paper for review by the First Nations and government officials.

311. Paper by Karen Restoule. For her paper “Recommendations from Jury Roll Selection – Problems or Symptom?” Ms. Restoule interviewed individuals from 15 First Nations regarding the criminal justice system and the jury process.269 The dominant theme of these interviews is consistent with what I heard throughout the engagement process – that there is a profound mistrust of, and alienation from, a criminal justice system that is perceived to be contrary to Anishinabek original jurisdiction over justice matters and devoid of Anishinabek legal principles or cultural values.

312. Ms. Restoule proposes that existing Community Justice Programs delivered by First Nations organizations in a culturally appropriate manner in 23 First Nations communities should be expanded to other areas of the justice system, including criminal trials for summary, hybrid, and indictable offences, as well as coroner’s inquests. She also proposes the creation of a model of justice based upon the American Tribal Courts as a process of reconciliation for the application of common law and Anishinabek Nation legal principles. Alternatively, Ms. Restoule suggests incorporating Indigenous legal principles into the criminal justice system as a means to encourage the participation of First Nations peoples on juries.

313. Ms. Restoule’s recommendations specific to the jury system include:

268 Mike Esquega Sr. (Northern Superior Regional Elder), Anishinabek Jury Selection Process, 2012
First Nations Legal Principles

• traditional legal principles of the Anishinabek Nation should be incorporated within the jury system, and the justice system as a whole, particularly when Anishinabek citizens are involved.

• a feast and/or relevant ceremonies should be held when any citizen of the Anishinabek Nation is involved in criminal or civil trials, whether as an accused or a victim.

Partnership with First Nations

• Anishinabek Nation leadership should be included in the development and implementation of any recommendations regarding the jury roll selection process and/or justice system stemming from this Independent Review.

• Elders should be included in any legal process involving a citizen of the Anishinabek Nation.

• Elders should be consulted regarding their role and level of participation within criminal or civil trials and coroner’s inquests.

• an ongoing relationship should be maintained between the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Anishinabek Nation.

• meetings and ceremonies should be held every year to reaffirm commitments between the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Anishinabek Nation, allowing for amendments to be made to the processes and trust to be built over time.

Resources

• adequate resources should be provided to citizens of the Anishinabek Nation attending jury duty. Further, criminal or civil trials and coroner’s inquests should be hosted within Anishinabek Nation territory to reduce costs substantially.

• adequate resources should be provided to accommodate the families of the individuals attending jury duty.

• resources should be provided to implement the recommendations stemming from this Independent Review.

Education

• training should be provided for all individuals working within the justice system, including the judiciary, legal, and administrative staff, and such initiatives should be developed and delivered in partnership with the Anishinabek Nation.

• there should be public legal education initiatives targeted towards First Nations peoples and youth that seek to create awareness of the role of juries. These initiatives should be developed and delivered in partnership with the Anishinabek Nation and local school boards. The distinctions between a criminal or civil jury versus an inquest jury should be emphasized in the materials.

Accessibility

• where possible, criminal or civil trials and coroner’s inquests should be held within the First Nation of the accused or victim, or within the Anishinabek Nation territory.

• where it is not possible to host the legal process within the Anishinabek Nation territory, the process should be made available to the First Nations involved via videoconferencing and resources for necessary equipment should be provided to First Nations of the Anishinabek Nation.
Language

- translation and interpretation services should be made available to all First Nations individuals selected to participate on a jury, as well as the families affected by the trial or inquest, including instances where video-conferencing is employed.

Eligibility

- the Canada and Ontario citizenship criteria for jury roll selection should be reconsidered. Many First Nations individuals do not identify as citizens of these jurisdictions.
- the criteria of having no prior criminal record should be reconsidered.
- the eligibility requirements for serving on a criminal or civil jury should differ from those for a coroner’s inquest.

Outreach Strategy

- an outreach strategy should be developed and delivered in partnership with the Anishinabek Nation, in order to ensure that materials are culturally appropriate.
- there should be an outreach strategy specifically geared towards engaging First Nations youth. It is important to ensure this strategy is “catchy.”

3. CHIEFS OF ONTARIO SUBMISSIONS

314. In a letter dated June 4, 2012, former Ontario Regional Chief Angus Toulouse submitted his thoughts and recommendations for changes to the current process for the assembly of the jury roll in Ontario, as it relates to First Nations peoples. Former Chief Toulouse recognized the importance of the Independent Review and pledged his full support.

315. The primary theme of the submissions of the Chiefs of Ontario, like that of others who have participated in this process, is that the encouragement of participation of First Nations peoples in the court system must be accompanied by the broader objective of eradicating systemic discrimination in the justice system. The Chiefs of Ontario cite several examples that they view as symptomatic of the ways in which the Canadian justice system is currently failing First Nations peoples through the subversion of First Nations legal traditions and customs and the failure to reconcile the Canadian legal system with First Nation legal principles and traditions.

316. The Chiefs view Canadian child welfare law as incongruous with the First Nations concept of the family unit, as it causes the relocation of many First Nations children. They raise the issue of inadequate attention given to the preparation of Gladue reports (pre-sentence reports) by probation officers. The Chiefs state that, rather than provide the proper context to determine an appropriate sentence, probation officers often perform a disservice to First Nations offenders because their reports are written with a Eurocentric bias. They also describe how traditional healing circles have essentially become sentencing circles that impose conventional criminal procedures and sentences, contrary to the healing attributes that First Nations seek. They describe the use of crimogenic risk assessments that are designed to assess the risks of reoffending, asserting that these reports are often used by the Crown in criminal proceedings as a tool to establish that First Nations offenders are at a high risk of re-offending. The Chiefs of Ontario argue that these reports create a bias against First Nations offenders by failing to consider the specific cultural context of the offender’s background.
317. The Chiefs of Ontario address the issue of the collection of names and addresses of on-reserve residents for the purposes of jury questionnaires. With respect to the option of drawing upon Ontario Health Insurance Program information as a source of names and addresses for on-reserve First Nations peoples, the Chiefs of Ontario argue that this data source, if used alone, would not capture all on-reserve First Nations peoples, as they note that many First Nations peoples in remote communities do not have health cards. In any event, they observe that simply identifying the ideal data source will not necessarily result in a higher response rate to jury questionnaires due to the broader systemic issues that have engendered a deep mistrust by First Nations peoples of the justice system.

318. The Chiefs of Ontario recommend that the Attorney General’s office include designated First Nations officials to address First Nation issues and intergovernmental relations. These positions, appointed to serve each treaty region or judicial district, could be mandated to collect information from the First Nations within the delineated regions and to maintain relationships with First Nations on justice matters and judicial services.

319. The Chiefs of Ontario advance four specific recommendations with respect to the jury forms:

- Citizen v. First Nations: It is recommended that the jury forms include a question relating to a person’s citizenship of a First Nation. It was explained that some First Nations do not relate to Canadian citizenship and often do not possess evidence of such.

- encourage First Nations members to complete and submit forms: It is recommended that both the Province of Ontario and the Federal Government work collaboratively with First Nations Governments, regional organizations or tribal councils to fund and provide an educational program that targets youth, designed to inform them of their legal and civil rights and duties within the Canadian constitutional and common law framework.

- exemption from jury service: It is recommended that Elders be exempted from jury service so that their traditional role and cultural integrity in the community is preserved.

- translation services: Increased and adequate translation services could help to encourage First Nations peoples to participate as potential jurors.

320. The Chiefs of Ontario maintain that the paramount factor for increasing the participation of First Nations peoples in the jury system is the recognition and accommodation of First Nations legal traditions and cultural differences. In addition, they identify two practical barriers to the participation of First Nations peoples on juries that require particular attention: the payment of transportation, accommodations and meals by the Ministry of the Attorney General; and the provision of support services to enable First Nations individuals to complete jury forms, attend at a trial or coroner’s inquest, and deal with post-jury duty psychological effects.

321. The Chiefs of Ontario conclude their comments by reinforcing the need for a respectful government-to-government relationship between First Nations and the Government of Ontario as a means to address the systemic issues plaguing the criminal justice system.

4. ABORIGINAL LEGAL SERVICES OF TORONTO SUBMISSIONS

322. Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto (ALST) is a multi-service legal agency that has served Toronto’s Aboriginal community for over 21 years. This organization has gained substantial experience through the representation of Aboriginal clients in coroner’s inquests, inquiries, criminal litigation, and advocacy to ensure Aboriginal clients receive equitable treatment in and access to the justice system. In particular, ALST has been actively involved in litigation that has considered and is considering the issue of the representation of First Nations peoples on juries.
323. ALST frames the issue of jury representativeness as one of fundamental justice, which they assert is being breached by the lack of representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll. As a general proposition, ALST is of the view that the issue of jury representation arises from the failure to fulfill the obligations demanded by section 6(8) of the Juries Act. They note that there is no consistent source list from which to draw on-reserve First Nations names, nor have sufficient efforts been made to ensure the jury roll is properly representative of First Nations peoples.

324. ALST asserts that First Nations people who reside on a reserve have the right to be considered for jury duty and that a properly representative jury is particularly important for Aboriginal accused persons in the criminal justice system. They note that systemic discrimination against Aboriginal people in the criminal justice system has been most recently affirmed by Canada’s highest court in R. v. Ipeelee and that an accused person being tried by a jury that is drawn from an unrepresentative jury roll potentially faces discrimination under section 15 of the Charter.

325. ALST addresses the connection between the historic exclusion of Aboriginal people from the Canadian justice system and the underrepresentation of on-reserve First Nations peoples on the jury roll. It notes the correlation between the overrepresentation of Aboriginal people in the penal systems and their exclusion from participation in the Canadian justice system, arguing that the latter is a factor that contributes to the excessive imprisonment of Aboriginal peoples.

326. ALST also addresses the connection between the coroner’s process and the jury roll issue. Because the number of Aboriginal peoples in the penal system is unrelenting, thereby increasing the probability of deaths that will occur while in custody, coroner’s inquests are of growing importance. Ensuring that inquest juries represent the Aboriginal population is integral to remedying the circumstances by which such deaths occur through a proper understanding of the historic, cultural, and contemporary contexts.

327. Following its review of recent litigation respecting the issues of representation of First Nations peoples on juries, ALST states that using Band Lists is not the most effective manner in which to ensure that First Nations peoples are represented on the jury roll in Ontario. They take this position for a number of reasons. First, ALST draws the distinction between those First Nations that control and administer their own membership lists and those First Nations that have chosen to leave their membership lists to be maintained by Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC). Of those First Nations that have regained control of their membership lists, they will have to consider the privacy interests of their members in deciding upon disclosure, just as AANDC must consider privacy issues. Those First Nations that have left their lists with AANDC rely on the federal Department to address this matter. Finally, ALST argues that band members ought to be involved in the decision-making that will, in effect, determine whether band members will participate in the jury system.

328. ALST questions the lack of consistency with respect to Ontario’s efforts to comply with section 6(8) of the Juries Act. ALST contends that Ontario failed to assess the impact of the Supreme Court of Canada’s decision in Corbiere v. Canada, preventing Court Services personnel from appreciating that the lists they relied upon likely contained names, without distinction, of First Nation citizens who reside off the reserve. Referring to the evidence of actions taken by local Court Services officials in the Thunder Bay and Kenora judicial districts to comply with section 6(8), ALST submits that the exercise of local authority and discretion within Court Services is not the appropriate means to address the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll.

329. In looking forward at ways to remedy the current problems of lack of representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario juries, ALST recommends Ontario follow the Manitoba model, under which, as I noted at paragraph 154, names of all Manitoba jurors are selected by data drawn from the provincial health registry. ALST notes that the Manitoba Justice Inquiry, to which I have also referred to at paragraph 154, found that this approach adequately addressed the representation issue, with the exception of Winnipeg, though no explanation for this exception was given.271

330. ALST makes a number of recommendations, categorizing them as either long term or interim activities. The recommendations are as follows:

(i) Long term Recommendations

General

• creation of a map that depicts judicial districts and the First Nations communities situated within them.
• clear and concise directives to regional Court Services offices in relation to:
  » standards of communication and outreach to First Nations communities and peoples;
  » recruiting First Nations staff in regions where there is a high percentage of First Nations population;
  » human resource policy on hiring, retaining and promoting First Nations employees within the Court Services Division; and
  » a policy that prioritizes the representation of First Nations peoples on the jury roll within the Court Services Division and Coroner’s Office.
• mandatory training for Sheriffs to familiarize them with the composition, political and cultural attributes of the First Nations in their respective judicial districts.

Training

• aboriginal cultural competency training for Court Services staff, Coroners and their counsel that includes general information about each First Nation, history of exclusion, overrepresentation and incarceration, inquest issues, cultural and lived experiences:
  » developed by or with First Nations
  » adequately funded » sustainable and transferrable; and » regularly updated.
• communications training for staff of the Court Services Division and Crown lawyers.

Relationships

• strategic outreach to First Nations leadership, tribal councils, political and territorial organizations, Aboriginal service agencies and women’s groups.

Coroner’s Services

- outreach to First Nations governments and communities to explain the importance of representation on inquest juries.
- regional and investigative coroners should meet with First Nations governments and political organizations regarding juries.

Legislative Changes

- research approaches from other jurisdictions that address First Nations access to justice and inclusion on the jury roll, the results of which should guide legislative change.
- create an equal system for all jurors.
- as an alternative to legislative change, Ontario should seek to enter into a Memorandum of Understanding with Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development for the provision of annual lists from the Indian Registration system of First Nations reserve residents.

Outreach

- an implementation committee should be created that includes First Nations governments and agencies from each judicial district that contains First Nations reserves.
- a public awareness campaign should be designed in consultation with First Nations peoples directed at the general public and legal professionals.
- Ontario should sponsor a Continuing Professional Development course certified by the Law Society of Upper Canada that addresses the representation issue.

(ii) Interim Recommendations

Court Services Division and Sheriffs

- training should be provided to all Sheriffs and court staff that are involved in implementing section 6(8) of the Juries Act. Training should incorporate a historical overview, information on First Nations governance systems, the impact of the Indian Act on Band Lists and voters lists, and cultural competency and communication training appropriate for dealing with First Nations peoples.
- changes should be made to the jury manual to set out a specific protocol regarding engagement with First Nations for the implementation of section 6(8).
- Court Services staff should make efforts to build relationships with First Nations communities, tribal councils and political and territorial organizations as part of a robust communication and outreach strategy.

Inquest Recommendations

- In the case of an unrepresentative jury roll, the Coroner should make direct efforts to communicate with the victim’s family to explore whether they want to proceed in any event of the existing jury roll, rather than unnecessarily delaying the inquest.
- The Coroner should explore what steps can be taken to implement a representative jury on a case-by-case basis, similar to what the Court of Appeal recommended in Pierre v. McRae, which was to order the sheriff to produce a list of jurors from a proper jury roll.
5. SUBMISSIONS OF THE OFFICE OF THE PROVINCIAL ADVOCATE FOR CHILDREN AND YOUTH

331. The Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth made submissions respecting a role for First Nations youth in the jury education process. The Provincial Advocate is an independent officer appointed by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. His mandate is to “provide an independent voice for children and youth and partner with them to bring issues forward; encourage communication and understanding between children and families and those who provide them with services and; educate children, youth and their caregivers about the rights of children and youth.” As part of his mandate, the Provincial Advocate works for the rights and interests of First Nations children and youth.

332. By way of context, the Provincial Advocate notes that First Nations peoples currently represent 16.7 percent to 19.7 percent of the prison population in Canada, while they represent only four percent of the overall Canadian population. According to the Provincial Advocate, these statistics are likely to worsen over the coming decade, and Ontario already has the third highest incarceration rate in Canada. It is the view of the Provincial Advocate that Aboriginal youth are almost eight times more likely to be in custody compared to their non-Aboriginal peers.

333. The socio-economic challenges faced by Aboriginal youth create a dire picture that begs for transformative changes to the justice system if First Nations peoples are to participate in the jury process. The Provincial Advocate explains that gang involvement, high rates of suicide, contact with the youth justice system, unemployment and underemployment, lack of education, history of physical and sexual abuse, and over-policing are matters that in one way or another burden the life of an Aboriginal youth. Accordingly, it is imperative that First Nations youth be involved in creating solutions to the jury system to counter the overrepresentation of First Nations peoples in the justice system and to lend their experience to address prevention approaches and alter perceptions that bar willingness to participate on juries.

334. In preparing his submissions, the Provincial Advocate’s office recruited a group of First Nations youth with whom it had previously worked to seek their perspectives and opinions regarding potential reforms aimed at inclusion of youth in the jury process. The Provincial Advocate’s office expressed a commitment to move forward with its recommendations that focus on educational processes to address the systemic barriers to First Nations youth and their communities insofar as participation on juries is concerned.

335. The Provincial Advocate identifies an initial challenge in working with First Nations youth in a reform process that he describes as needing to overcome a “confidence deficit”. Many First Nations youth have come to feel apathetic towards the “system” because the government has failed to provide the most basic of services, like clean water, health care, food security or safe housing. Coupled with the historical wrongs committed by government in relation to First Nations’ culture, language, loss of land, racism, discrimination and other injustices, many First Nations youth feel disempowered to effect any sort of change.

336. Also contributing to the confidence deficit is the pattern of exclusion of First Nations youth from decision-making regarding matters that affect their lives. Such exclusion serves to undermine their confidence in their own ability to make sound decisions. The confidence deficit effectively impedes motivation on the part of First Nations youth to become involved in reformatory change. However, according to the Provincial Advocate, with the necessary supports, this challenge is manageable.

337. The Provincial Advocate suggests a number of ways to empower First Nations youth to willingly participate in changing the system to better serve their rights and interests. First, youth must come to understand and appreciate that they possess certain definable rights by virtue of being First Nations citizens, as well as citizens of Ontario and Canada. The Provincial Advocate’s office states that given its role in rights education, it is well-positioned to act as a resource for First Nations youth as they advocate for change in Ontario’s Justice System.
338. The Provincial Advocate advances the concept of civic engagement as an effective framework to explain an individual’s obligation to the jury process. Educating First Nations youth about how they can contribute to their community in a meaningful way by applying their lived experiences can be an effective way to instill motivation for active community engagement. The community is strengthened by maximizing the number of youth that are taught the importance of civic engagement, in the context of First Nations’ cultural values and norms. Once seen in that context, First Nations youth can then apply this concept to the broader community and, in particular, the jury process.

339. The Provincial Advocate stresses the importance of the Gladue\textsuperscript{272} case and the principles espoused therein as a tool to entice young people to become active in the reform process. Ensuring that the Gladue principles are properly applied to Aboriginal offenders is a way in which First Nations youth can positively exercise their civic engagement. Moreover, sentencing options available through the application of the Gladue principles present an opportunity for young people to learn about their First Nation’s traditional laws, values, and approaches to the restoration of harmony and justice and how that can be applied in a daily setting. Being involved in a community’s restorative justice process can be an invaluable teaching tool that demonstrates the resolution of conflict and the return to harmony. This is a positive exercise of the justice system. The Provincial Advocate asserts that any systemic reform of the justice system must be based upon the Gladue principles. Reforms must be focused on remedying the overrepresentation of First Nations peoples in prisons and the circumstances by which the lives of First Nations peoples are the subject of coroner’s inquests.

340. As a first step, the Provincial Advocate recommends initiating a discussion that brings together First Nations youth to strategize on the development and delivery of jury education workshops. He further recommends that a strong mentorship relationship be fostered between Justice officials and First Nations youth to reinforce the commitment to move towards systemic change.

341. Specific recommendations proposed by the Provincial Advocate include:

- First Nations young people be brought together so that they can share their knowledge, questions and concerns about Ontario’s justice system and be educated regarding the role of the jury process in improving the conditions that influence the delivery of justice to First Nations peoples.

- the Provincial Advocate’s Office work in partnership with First Nations youth, communities and leadership to develop recommendations that are specific to what is needed to create a justice system that is fair and just in their eyes and anchored in their rights under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

- First Nations young people be provided with the opportunity to work with their Elders, the Provincial Advocate’s office and the justice system to create a mentorship model that encourages the participation of youth in the jury process.

- young people be provided with an opportunity to work with the Provincial Advocate’s office to develop educational activities, and participate in a process to help develop a systemic policy framework to transform the jury process. Early education is a key strategy to ensure that young First Nations people are informed of how jury service can contribute to delivering justice for First Nations people.

- a review of the current jury recruitment and selection process be conducted to identify the barriers for First Nations young people and adults and changes that are necessary to promote involvement in jury service that is aligned with a cultural approach to civic engagement.

step of beginning – rather than ending – my recommendations with the section on Implementation, which includes recommendations for establishing bodies that will be instrumental in turning the words on the page in my Report into action.

348. Second, it is obvious that all the recommendations listed below cannot be implemented at the same time. It is also abundantly clear that resolving the issues on jury representation is going to take time. There is no magic bullet that can provide an instantaneous solution. Consequently, the implementation of various recommendations will need to be prioritized, and milestones and targets scheduled. This is part of the work I anticipate will be carried out by the Implementation Committee and its support staff, which I describe in the section on Implementation of Recommendations that follows.

349. Third, in making recommendations, it is virtually impossible for me to calculate or estimate the financial costs of the recommendations. The Independent Review team has neither the capacity nor expertise to perform those tasks. However, the terms of the mandate as stated in the Order-in-Council call for me to take the financial situation into account in putting forth recommendations.

350. I believe that the best way to comply with the terms of reference, and to make recommendations for the improvement in the representation of on-reserve First Nations peoples on juries, while being respectful of Ontario’s financial condition, is the following approach. I have made recommendations that I believe should be made based on what I have heard or observed to improve the jury representation situation. If, on further analysis, these prove to be financially difficult, I would suggest that consideration be given to modify the recommendation in a way that reduces costs while not changing the substance of the recommendation. Alternatively that particular recommendation might be deferred since, as mentioned, every recommendation practically cannot be implemented at the same time. However, these are examples of matters to be left to the Implementation Committee, as discussed below.

351. I realize that many of my recommendations will involve costs, but I would like to say that as much as I can, I have taken financial considerations into account in making the recommendations. With that said, when principles of justice and fairness for thousands of people are involved, the financial aspects of the matter should not trump those fundamental principles in any material way. Moreover, the costs of doing nothing will likely be more than the costs of implementing these recommendations, when one considers the expenses involved by the present approach. This is apart from the greater potential for loss of liberty and increased distress for First Nations peoples and a further deterioration in the relations between the Ministry and First Nations.

352. Fourth, it became apparent almost immediately from the start of the Independent Review that the problems with improving the representation of First Nations peoples on juries are inextricably connected with problems arising from the justice system’s treatment of members of First Nations generally. This is an undeniable fact. I realize that my review is not about reforming the justice system of Ontario, but I would be derelict in my duty as the Independent Reviewer to avoid any discussion of the need to address serious issues that arise from how the justice system impacts the question of jury representation. Accordingly, I feel compelled to put forth recommendations which deal with these broader issues. Some of these issues relating to the justice system may be ones for longer term responses, but they are not to be ignored if progress and improvement are to be achieved.

353. Fifth, in listing my recommendations, I do not wish to imply that they are complete in every way, as they may require some fine tuning at the implementation stage, or more substantially, further analysis or study or consultation with First Nations. In addition, I greatly benefitted from the myriad of recommendations from various groups and individuals that have been summarized above. I have done so because the Implementation Committee may well wish to consider some of them as the Committee deems appropriate.
354. Finally, and most importantly, while I believe all of the recommendations below are desirable and would go a long way to enhancing the representation of First Nations peoples on juries, something even more fundamental is required.

355. In my experience dealing with Aboriginal issues as a lawyer (in both public and private practice) and judge, too often I have seen evidence or examples of mistrust and disrespect between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians, whether the latter are government or private institutions or individuals. Although the evils of racism and discrimination have diminished over time, much more is needed to foster a relationship of harmony and enlightened co-existence between Aboriginals and non-Aboriginals. Without building a foundation of mutual respect and mutual trust for each other, the recommendations below will achieve nothing. And that respect and trust has to be earned not proclaimed. Concrete proposals and mutual effort are required.

356. To my mind, the model relationship between the two groups should be partners rather than what history reveals as adversaries. First Nations do have governments, and this Independent Review has reinforced my belief in the importance of emphasizing a government-to-government relationship that incorporates an underlying respect for cultural, traditional, and historical values that are different. It is this government-to-government relationship that must underlie the relationship between Ontario and First Nations going forward in dealing with justice and jury representation issues. To recognize this, I have recommended the models of the Implementation Committee and the Advisory Group to the Attorney-General as outlined below.

2. IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS — ESTABLISHING AN IMPLEMENTATION COMMITTEE AND MINISTER’S ADVISORY GROUP

357. As noted in the introduction above, I have decided to begin my recommendations with this section on implementation. I do so in order to emphasize the fundamental importance of the government moving quickly to create – in partnership with First Nations in Ontario – bodies that can effectively begin the work of responding not just to the problem of underrepresentation of First Nations individuals on juries, but to the broader systemic challenges that have been identified in the course of the Independent Review.

358. As frequently mentioned, cynicism and mistrust of jury participation along with similar concerns about the justice system are widespread within First Nations communities. That cynicism includes doubts among First Nations that much will ever come out of this Independent Review. The Order-in-Council, to some extent, recognizes implicitly this state of affairs. In addition to calling for recommendations to enhance the representation of on-reserve First Nations peoples on juries, it calls for recommendations “to strengthen the understanding, cooperation and relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations on this issue”.

359. To meet the implementation part of my mandate, I have two major recommendations to put forward: the establishment of an Implementation Committee with government and First Nations members and the setting up of an Advisory Group to the Attorney General on matters affecting First Nations and the Justice System.
360. RECOMMENDATION 1: I recommend that the Ministry of the Attorney General establish an Implementation Committee consisting of a substantial First Nations membership along with Government officials and individuals who could, because of their background or expertise, contribute significantly to the work of the Implementation Committee. This Committee would be responsible for the oversight of the implementation of the below recommendations and related matters. In view of the importance and urgency of the matter, I recommend that the Committee be established as soon as practically possible.

361. Having First Nations membership that is substantial and not mere tokenism would underscore the seriousness of the Ministry of the Attorney General to improving the relationship between the Ministry and First Nations and increase the chances of greater acceptance within the First Nations. An example of someone with a unique background or expertise that should be represented on the Committee is an individual who could be a First Nations youth representative. Such a representative would be valuable because of the serious issues facing First Nations youth and the importance of the perspective that a youth representative on the Committee could bring to it, given the dramatic demographic increase of youth referred to in paragraph 228.

362. I do not wish to specify the exact number of people who would serve on the Committee except to say it should be large enough to include individuals who can contribute from their experience and qualifications to the work of the Committee, yet small enough to avoid difficulty in scheduling meetings and conducting its business. It may be that approximately seven to nine members is the appropriate range.

363. The Committee will need to have a support group, which should not be large in number, and could involve secondments from existing Ministry of the Attorney General staff and others as appropriate.

364. The Committee would be appointed by the Attorney General for a three year term with the possibility of a renewal for an additional term. A small secretariat would need to be assembled with the appointment of an Executive Director who could come from the public service.

365. The Committee members would be paid pursuant to provincial practice for boards of directors for independent Crown agencies. The budgets and expenses for the Committee’s work would be subject to approval pursuant to Management Board guidelines and established Government of Ontario procedures.

366. The Implementation Committee would be responsible for such things as:

(a) developing a timetable for implementing the recommendations with milestones to achieve measurable targets as appropriate;

(b) establishing protocols for meetings, decision making, and related matters;

(c) issuing annual reports to the Attorney General on progress made in the implementation of recommendations and changes that are deemed important by the Committee to make;

(d) ensuring there is a proper liaison with the Deputy Attorney General and other officials of the Ministry to achieve a cooperative and collaborative working relationship;

(e) developing and transmitting recommendations of the Committee for implementation to the Deputy Attorney General for approval; and

(f) receiving periodic reports from Ministry officials on implementation of recommendations and related matters.
(B) ADVISORY GROUP TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
ON FIRST NATIONS PEOPLES AND THE JUSTICE SYSTEM

367. RECOMMENDATION 2: To address paragraph 1(b) of the Order in Council 1288/2011 on August 11, 2011 establishing my mandate, I recommend that the Attorney General establish an Advisory Group to the Attorney General on matters affecting First Nations peoples and the Justice System. Creating this Group would not only underscore the commitment of the Ministry to improve their relationship with First Nations on jury issues but also on justice system concerns that are related to the participation of First Nations peoples on juries.

368. As I have already mentioned, I believe that relations between the justice system and First Nations have reached the crisis stage. As one senior Ontario government official told us: “justice has not been a friend to First Nations”. This situation has been arrived at over many years of neglect, and a response is required on many fronts, including a top down approach for the Attorney General to seek the candid advice and wisdom of those directly affected, namely First Nations. In my view, this would be welcomed by the First Nations leaders and people with one major proviso: the Advisory Group should not be window dressing but be an effective mechanism for the Attorney General to receive valuable input from First Nations to begin a real pathway to improve elements of the justice system that for too long have been ignored as far as First Nations peoples are concerned.

369. The Group could be asked to meet periodically but at least twice a year as decided by the Attorney General. I would leave other details for the Group, such as membership, to the determination by the Attorney General since it would be presumptuous of me to go any further. In a similar vein, I do not wish to prescribe the agenda items for such a group. We heard much from First Nations people about the importance of restorative justice in the justice system. Accordingly, that could be a point for discussion by the Advisory Group.

370. The recommendations to set up an Implementation Committee and an Advisory Group to the Attorney General will not by that alone solve all the concerns that have been outlined in this Report, but it will signal an important and much needed change in the commitment of Ministry officials to improve the situation facing First Nations. The effective working of the Implementation Committee and Advisory Group will go beyond the signaling stage of a changed commitment, but could well lead to an improved relationship between First Nations and the Ministry of the Attorney General, and even better still to positive and meaningful improvements for First Nations peoples.

3. RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING SYSTEMATIC CONCERNS ABOUT THE JUSTICE SYSTEM

371. As I have repeatedly emphasized throughout the Report, it is clear to me that meaningful progress can only be made in improving the representation of First Nations peoples on Ontario’s jury roll if steps are also taken at the same time to respond to the systemic issues that have prevented First Nations peoples from participating in Ontario’s justice system.

372. These systemic issues include:

- conflict between First Nations and Euro-Canadian approaches to criminal justice;
- the systemic racism that unfortunately still appears to be present in our justice system, including instances of mistreatment of First Nations inmates in prison, general disrespect by police and discriminatory public reaction to First Nations complaints;
- the almost universally-held view of First Nations individuals that the justice system is alien or foreign;
- the problem of inadequate legal representation of First Nations individuals, particularly in the north, resulting in virtually automatic guilty pleas;
- but on the positive side, I heard or read some commentary to the effect that if positive changes are made to the justice system then the reticence of First Nations individuals to participate on juries will lessen.
373. In order to address these systemic issues, I recommend that:

- RECOMMENDATION 3: after obtaining the input of the Implementation Committee, the Ministry of the Attorney General provide cultural training for all government officials working in the justice system who have contact with First Nations peoples, including police, court workers, Crown prosecutors, prison guards and other related agencies.

  I appreciate that a certain level of cultural training is already provided, having been the beneficiary of such training myself as a former judge. However, this training must be consistent, comprehensive and broadly available to all persons working in the justice system who have contact with First Nations peoples, not episodic, ad hoc or limited to certain groups of people.

- RECOMMENDATION 4: the Ministry of the Attorney General carry out the following studies for eventual input by the Implementation Committee:

  (a) a study on legal representation that would involve Legal Aid Ontario, particularly in the north, that would cover a variety of topics, including the adequacy of existing legal representation, the location and schedule of court sittings, and related matters. Particular attention should be paid to the practice in the Northwest Territories of holding hearings in remote locations and drawing jury rolls exclusively from residents within 30 kilometres of the court. Similarly, in Alaska the jury pool is drawn from residents within 50 miles of remote courthouses and the defendant has the ability to challenge the representativeness of the jury pool, among other improvements implemented by the state of Alaska outlined in paragraph 193. Northern Ontario's geographical and demographic conditions are very similar to these two jurisdictions;

  (b) a study on First Nations policing issues, including the recognition of First Nations police forces through enabling legislation, the establishment of a regulatory body to oversee the operation of First Nations law enforcement programs, the creation of an independent review board to adjudicate policing complaints, and the development of mandatory cultural competency training for OPP officers; and

  These studies and reviews need not be long, drawn-out initiatives, and could be carried out by Ministry staff, of course in consultation with First Nations. Ultimately the studies and review should be submitted to the Implementation Committee for review and recommendations.

- RECOMMENDATION 5: the Ministry of the Attorney General create an Assistant Deputy Attorney General (ADAG) position responsible for Aboriginal issues, including the implementation of this Report. This official would need a small support group that could draw on the expertise of officials already in the Ministry. The ADAG would have ongoing responsibility for matters affecting First Nations and jury representation, as well as issues with the justice system, as deemed appropriate. This person should be a member of the Implementation Committee, and his/her colleagues would be actively involved in providing input through him/her to the Committee and to the advisory group to the Attorney General as directed. As an example of his/her role, noting the confusion and lack of transparency regarding jury districts in Ontario, the ADAG should be asked to make a map of these districts publicly available.

- RECOMMENDATION 6: after obtaining the input of the Implementation Committee, the Ministry of the Attorney General provide broader and more comprehensive justice education programs for First Nations individuals, including:
(a) developing brochures in First Nations languages with plain wording which provide comprehensive information on the justice system, including information respecting the role played by criminal, civil, and coroner’s juries;

(b) establishing First Nations liaison officers responsible for consulting with First Nations on juries and on justice issues. The officers would be assigned approximately 15 reserves for their liaison work and would be First Nations people. The officers would also undergo a training program to provide them with the background information necessary to perform their roles; this program would be developed by the Ministry of the Attorney General. The liaison officers could be tasked with holding Jury Information Forums on the reserves within their purview;

(c) commissioning the creation of video or other educational instruments, particularly in First Nations languages, that would be used to educate First Nations individuals as to the role played by the jury in the justice system and the importance of participating on the jury; and

(d) considering the feasibility of a program that would enlist students from Ontario law schools to participate in intensive summer education and legal assistance programs for First Nations representatives, dealing with the justice system generally and the jury system in particular, in consultation with Chiefs, and Court Services officials.

It is important to emphasize that all of the education initiatives above would have to be carried out with the input of the Implementation Committee, but also in consultation with PTOs, other associations, and First Nations.

• RECOMMENDATION 7: With respect to First Nations youth, in addition to having a youth member on the Implementation Committee, the Implementation Committee should request that the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth facilitate a conference of representative youth members from First Nations reserves to focus on specific issues in the relationship between youth, juries, and the justice system, addressed in this report. The Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth should prepare a report on that conference; prior to submitting the report to the Implementation Committee the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth should consult with PTOs and other First Nations associations.

4. RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING THE REFORM OF THE JURY SELECTION PROCESS

374. There is a consensus shared with everyone with whom I met, including government officials, that the current practices followed by Court Services officials to compile the jury list are not achieving results that adequately represent First Nations individuals on the jury roll. It is clear that steps must be taken to obtain access to a database that contains an up-to-date record of the names of individuals living on reserve. The current reliance by Court Services officials on obtaining the names from Band List information, though resulting from well-meaning efforts, is ad hoc and leads in many cases to out-of-date and otherwise unreliable information being used to compile the jury roll. In addition to obtaining an accurate and comprehensive data base, it is clear that much more needs to be done to encourage First Nations individuals to complete and return jury questionnaires when they receive them, and to serve on juries when summoned to do so.

375. As with my recommendations respecting systemic issues, it is crucial that approaches to deal with these challenges be carried out collaboratively with PTOs and First Nations and coordinated through the Implementation Committee described above, that they take into consideration interests of individual privacy, and that they give due respect to First Nations’ autonomy. My hope is that if these issues are pursued on the basis of a relationship of mutual respect and consistently with the government-to-government relationship between First Nations and Ontario, First Nations governments will cooperate to find practical solutions that will overcome these privacy and other logistical issues, so that an appropriate comprehensive an accurate database of First Nations individuals living on reserve can be compiled.
In order to address these issues, I recommend that:

- RECOMMENDATION 8: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, undertake a prompt and urgent review of the feasibility of, and mechanisms for, using the OHIP database to generate a database of First Nations individuals living on reserve for the purposes of compiling the jury roll. This appears to me to be the most promising means by which First Nations names can be added to jury rolls. It is my hope that, if it proves feasible, the use of the OHIP database will be implemented on an urgent basis.

- RECOMMENDATION 9: in connection with this review, the Ministry of Attorney General and First Nations, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider all other potential sources for generating this database, including band residency information, Ministry of Transportation information and other records, and steps that might be taken to secure these records, such as a renewed memorandum of understanding between Ontario and the Federal government respecting band residency information or memorandums of understanding between Ontario and PTOs or First Nations, as appropriate.

- RECOMMENDATION 10: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider amending the questionnaire sent to prospective jurors to:

  (a) make the language as simple as possible;

  (b) translate the questionnaire into First Nations languages as appropriate;

  (c) remove the wording threatening a fine for non-compliance and replacing it with wording stating simply that Ontario law requires the recipient to complete and return the form because of the importance of the jury in ensuring fair trials under Ontario’s justice system;

  (d) on the premise that a First Nations member living on reserve in Ontario satisfies the Canadian citizenship requirement under s. 2(b) of the Juries Act, add an option for First Nations individual to identify themselves as First Nations members or citizens rather than Canadian citizens;

  (e) enable First Nations elected officials, such as Chiefs and Councillors, as well as Elders, to be excluded from jury duty; and

  (f) provide, through an amendment to the Juries Act, for a more realistic period than the current five days for the return of jury questionnaires.

- RECOMMENDATION 11: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider implementing the practice from parts of the U.S., that when a jury summons or questionnaire is undeliverable or is not returned, another summons or questionnaire is sent out to a resident of the same postal code, thereby ensuring that nonresponsive prospective jurors do not undermine jury representativeness.

- RECOMMENDATION 12: the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider a procedure whereby First Nations people on reserve could volunteer for jury service as a means of supplementing other jury source lists. This is practised in New York State as a way to supplement jury rolls drawn from several other lists that might overlook certain individuals, and could serve a similarly valuable purpose with respect to First Nations peoples in Ontario. By supplementing other jury source lists in this manner, the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Implementation Committee would wish to be satisfied that this would not offend the randomness principle.
• RECOMMENDATION 13: The Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, consider enabling First Nations people not fluent in English or French to serve on juries by providing translation services and by amending the jury questionnaire accordingly to reflect this change.

• RECOMMENDATION 14: The Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, adopt measures to respond to the problem of First Nations individuals with criminal records for minor offences being automatically excluded from jury duty by:

  (a) amending the Juries Act provisions that exclude individuals who have been convicted of certain offences from inclusion on the jury roll, to make them consistent with the relevant Criminal Code provisions, which exclude a narrower group of individuals;

  (c) considering whether, after a certain period of time, an individual previously convicted of certain offences could become eligible again for jury service. In New South Wales, people with prior convictions are barred from jury service for two to five years, depending on the offence.

• RECOMMENDATION 15: The Ministry of the Attorney General discuss with the Implementation Committee the advisability of recommending to the Attorney General of Canada an amendment to the Criminal Code that would prevent the use of peremptory challenges to discriminate against First Nations people serving on juries. A practice that has developed in the U.S. by which judges are able to supervise the exercise of peremptory challenges, if a judge is of the opinion that the challenge is being used in a discriminatory manner. The point of this is that, if every change in the Report is implemented to its fullest, First Nations jury service could still be significantly undermined through discriminatory use of peremptory challenges. It should also be recalled that the Manitoba Inquiry report recommended the abolition of peremptory challenges to avoid the underrepresentation of Aboriginal people on juries.

5. RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING JURY MEMBER COMPENSATION

377. The current compensation for jury members of $40 per day from the 11th to 49th day of a trial, and $100 per day after the 49th day, has been in place since 1991. Considering the Consumer Price Index, if these figures had risen with inflation, they would have stood at $57.92, and $144.81 at the end of 2011, respectively.274

378. We heard many concerns expressed about the low levels of compensation as well as failure to reimburse for the real costs incurred by a prospective juror for child care or Elder case expenses. We have not had sufficient time or resources to examine this issue with the thoroughness it deserves. However, from all that I have heard on the subject an upward adjustment appears to be warranted, as does a reconsideration of the present provision of no compensation for the first ten days of jury service.

379. RECOMMENDATION 16: In view of the concerns I have heard and the fact that current jury compensation is not consistent with cost-of-living increases, I recommend that the Ministry of the Attorney General refer the issue of jury member compensation to the Implementation Committee for consideration and recommendation.

6. RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING CORONER’S INQUESTS

380. The issue of improving First Nations representation on coroner’s inquests is worthy of special consideration for at least four reasons.

381. First, as described at paragraphs 102 and 103 above, the role played by coroner’s juries in answering certain questions and making recommendations, as opposed to making findings of guilt, is remarkably consistent with what has been described to me as the traditional way in which justice has been administered by First Nations communities. My experience in speaking with First Nations individuals was that, while they expressed reluctance to engage in the “judging” involved in being on a criminal jury, they were interested to learn about how the coroner’s jury process works and expressed interest in becoming involved.

382. Second, although members of coroner’s inquest juries are drawn from the same list as jurors for criminal and civil trials, the process by which the coroner selects a jury is distinct from the criminal and civil jury selection process. As I described at paragraph 102 above, when the coroner begins an inquest, he or she issues a warrant which requires the Provincial Jury Centre to provide a list of jurors living in the area where the death occurred. The Coroner’s Constable then selects the names of people whom he or she believes to be “suitable to serve as jurors at an inquest” from that list and issues summonses requiring them to attend at the place of inquest. This process is significantly different from the criminal jury process in particular, which emphasizes the importance of random selection and provides procedural protections for the accused and Crown to challenge jurors and have them removed from the list.

383. Third, it is apparent that the families of First Nations individuals who are the subject of coroner’s inquests have a strong and compelling interest in having First Nations individuals, ideally from same community as the individual whose death is being investigated, take part in the coroner’s inquest jury. I was very moved to hear these families’ stories during the forum organized by Aboriginal Legal Services Toronto. While I do not want to underestimate the importance of First Nations individuals serving on criminal juries, I note that the issue of underrepresentation of First Nations individuals on juries has been particularly prominent in the context of coroner’s inquests.

384. Finally, I heard during the engagement process and in the submissions of a number of participants that some First Nations individuals might have an interest in volunteering for jury duty. I understand that this may raise issues of randomness in the context of a criminal or civil trial (though, as I have pointed out, volunteering for jury duty exists in New York State). That is why I have recommended that volunteer service for criminal juries be further considered by the Implementation Committee. But volunteering to be on the jury roll for a coroner’s inquest is compatible with the distinct way in which a coroner’s jury is empanelled, as well as the unique objectives of a coroner’s inquest.

385. RECOMMENDATION 17: For all of the above reasons, I recommend that the Ministry of the Attorney General, in consultation with the Implementation Committee, institute a process that would allow for First Nations individuals to volunteer to be on the jury roll for the purposes of empanelling a jury for a coroner’s inquest.
On the recommendation of the undersigned, the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the advice and concurrence of the Executive Council, orders that:

WHEREAS the Juries Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, governs the jury process in Ontario, including the process for preparing the jury roll;

WHEREAS subsection 6 (8) of the Juries Act prescribes the process for selecting persons living on reserve communities for potential inclusion on the jury roll;

WHEREAS it has been determined that it is desirable to authorize under the common law, pursuant to the prerogative of Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario, and in the discharge of the government’s executive functions, an individual to review the process for including persons living on reserve communities on the jury roll and to do so independently of government and on a systemic basis;

WHEREAS Nishnawbe Aski Nation has resolved as a political territorial organization to work with the Ontario government and the Independent Reviewer to enhance the representation on jury rolls of First Nations persons living on reserve communities in its territories;

WHEREAS other First Nations have been, and are, or may be desirous of the same goal;

AND WHEREAS it is desirable to set out the terms of reference for such a review;

THEREFORE, it is ordered that the Honourable Frank Iacobucci be appointed as an Independent Reviewer and authorized to conduct such a review;
AND THAT the terms of reference for the Honourable Frank Iacobucci be as follows:

MANDATE

1. The Independent Reviewer shall conduct a systemic review and report on any relevant legislation and processes for including First Nations persons living on reserve on the jury roll from which potential jurors are selected for all jury trials and coroners inquests, in order to make recommendations:

   a. to ensure and enhance the representation of First Nations persons living on reserve communities on the jury roll; and

   b. to strengthen the understanding, cooperation and relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations on this issue.

2. The Independent Reviewer shall conduct the review in an expeditious manner and shall deliver his final report and recommendations to the Attorney General no later than August 31, 2012.

3. While promoting the achievement of the goals described above, any recommendations developed should take into account the challenging fiscal context for government and First Nations in Ontario.

4. In conducting the review, the Independent Reviewer shall:

   a. review the existing legislation and processes, practices and past practices;

   b. review and consider any existing records or reports relevant to this mandate, including jury rolls in a systemic context, and any transcripts relating to public legal proceedings;

   c. conduct interjurisdictional analysis, including any relevant legislation, and identify best practices.

ET QUE le mandat de l’honorable Frank Iacobucci soit le suivant :

MANDAT

1. L’examinateur indépendant procède à un examen systémique et prépare un rapport sur les dispositions législatives et la procédure pertinentes en vue d’inclure des membres des Premières nations vivant dans des réserves sur la liste des jurés à partir de laquelle sont choisis les jurés potentiels pour tous les procès devant jury et toutes les enquêtes du coroner, dans le but de faire des recommandations visant ce qui suit :

   a. garantir et accroître la représentation, sur la liste des jurés, des membres des Premières nations vivant dans des réserves;

   b. consolider la compréhension, la collaboration et les relations entre le ministère du Procureur général et les Premières nations en ce qui concerne cette question.

2. L’examinateur indépendant procède promptement à l’examen et remet son rapport final et ses recommandations au procureur général au plus tard le 31 août 2012.

3. Bien qu’elles visent à favoriser la réalisation des buts énoncés ci-dessus, les recommandations formulées devraient tenir compte de la conjoncture fiscale difficile à laquelle font face le gouvernement et les Premières nations de l’Ontario.

4. Dans le cadre de son examen, l’examinateur indépendant :

   a. examine les dispositions législatives et la procédure en vigueur ainsi que les pratiques actuelles et passées;

   b. examine et étudie les dossiers ou les rapports existants qui se rapportent à son mandat, y compris les listes de jurés dans un contexte systémique, et les transcriptions relatives aux procédures judiciaires publiques;

   c. procède à une analyse interterritoriale, notamment des dispositions législatives pertinentes, et détermine les meilleures pratiques à suivre.
5. In conducting the review, the Independent Reviewer may request any person to provide information or records to him, hold public and/or private meetings and hold consultations with First Nations communities, including attendances on First Nations communities.

6. The Independent Reviewer shall invite and receive submissions in writing from any First Nation, First Nation political territorial organization, First Nation organization, member of a First Nation as well as from any interested party, including ministries of government.

7. In fulfilling his mandate, the Independent Reviewer shall not report on any individual cases that are, have been, or may be subject to a criminal investigation or

8. The Independent Reviewer shall perform his duties without making any findings of fact in relation to misconduct, or expressing any conclusions or recommendations regarding the civil or criminal liability of any person or organization, and without interfering in any investigations or criminal or other legal proceedings.

9. In delivering his report to the Attorney General, the Independent Reviewer shall ensure that the report is in a form appropriate, pursuant to the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act and other applicable legislation, and in sufficient quantity, for public release and be responsible for translation and printing, and shall ensure that it is available in English, French, Cree, Ojibway, Oji-Cree and Mohawk at the same time, in electronic and printed versions. The Attorney General shall make the report available to the public.

RESOURCES

10. Within a budget approved by the Ministry of the Attorney General the Independent Reviewer may retain such counsel, staff, or expertise he considers necessary in the performance of his duties at reasonable remuneration approved by the Ministry of the Attorney General. They shall be reimbursed for reasonable expenses

5. Dans le cadre de son examen, l'examinateur indépendant peut demander à toute personne de lui fournir des renseignements ou des documents, tenir des séances publiques ou à huis clos et engager des consultations avec des collectivités des Premières nations, y compris se rendre sur place.

7. Dans le cadre de son mandat, l'examinateur indépendant ne doit pas faire rapport sur des causes particulières qui font, ont fait ou peuvent faire l'objet d'une enquête, notamment pénale, d'une poursuite pénale ou d'une autre procédure judiciaire.

8. L'examinateur indépendant s'acquitte de ses fonctions sans tirer de conclusions de fait en matière d'inconduite ni formuler de conclusions ou de recommandations quant à la responsabilité civile ou pénale de toute personne ou de tout organisme et sans intervenir dans des enquêtes ou des procédures judiciaires, notamment des poursuites pénales.

9. L'examinateur indépendant veille à remettre son rapport au procureur général sous une forme appropriée, conformément à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information et la protection de la vie privée et aux autres lois applicables, et en nombre d'exemplaires suffisant pour sa diffusion publique et doit en assurer la traduction et l'impression. En outre, il fait en sorte qu'il soit disponible en même temps en version française, anglaise, cri, ojibway, ojicri et mohawk et tant sur support électronique que papier. Le procureur général met le rapport à la disposition du public.

RESSOURCES

10. Dans le cadre d’un budget approuvé par le ministère du Procureur général, l’examinateur indépendant peut retenir les services des avocats, du personnel ou des experts qu’il juge nécessaires à l’exercice de ses fonctions selon la rémunération raisonnable approuvée par le ministère du Procureur général. Les incurred in connection with their duties in accordance with Management Board of Cabinet Directives and Guidelines.

11. The Independent Reviewer shall establish and maintain a website and use other technologies to promote accessibility and transparency to the public.

12. The Independent Reviewer shall follow Management Board of Cabinet Directives and Guidelines and other applicable government policies in obtaining other services and goods he considers necessary in the performance of his duties unless, in his view, it is not possible to follow them.

13. The Independent Reviewer may make recommendations to the Attorney General or the Deputy Attorney General regarding funding for parties who have information relevant to the systemic issues and who would be unable to participate in the review without such funding. Any such funding recommendations shall be in accordance with Management Board of Cabinet Directives and Guidelines.

14. All ministries and all agencies, boards and commissions of the Government of Ontario shall, subject to any privilege or other legal restrictions, assist the Independent Reviewer to the fullest extent so that the Independent Reviewer may carry out his duties and shall respect the independence of the review.

personnes retenues se font rembourser les frais raisonnables engagés dans l’exercice de leurs fonctions, conformément aux directives et aux lignes directrices du Conseil de gestion du gouvernement.

11. L’examineur indépendant se dote d’un site Web et utilise d’autres technologies pour promouvoir l’accessibilité et la transparence.

12. À moins que, à son avis, cela ne soit pas possible, l’examineur indépendant suit les directives et les lignes directrices du Conseil de gestion du gouvernement ainsi que les autres politiques applicables du gouvernement dans le cadre de l’obtention des autres biens et services qu’il estime nécessaires à l’exercice de ses fonctions.

13. L’examineur indépendant peut faire des recommandations au procureur général ou au sous-procureur général en ce qui concerne le financement des parties qui détiennent des renseignements se rapportant aux questions systémiques et qui, à défaut de ce financement, ne seraient pas en mesure de participer à l’examen. Ces recommandations doivent être conformes aux directives et aux lignes directrices du Conseil de gestion du gouvernement.

DEFINITIONS
1. In this Act,
"county" includes a district; ("comté")
"Director of Assessment" means the employee of the Municipal Property Assessment Corporation who is appointed by the Corporation to be the Director of Assessment under this Act; ("directeur de l’évaluation") "regulations" means the regulations made under this Act. ("règlements") R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 1; 1997, c. 43, Sched. G, s. 22; 2001, c. 8, s. 206.

ELIGIBILITY

ELIGIBLE JURORS
2. Subject to sections 3 and 4, every person who,
(a) resides in Ontario;
(b) is a Canadian citizen; and
(c) in the year preceding the year for which the jury is selected had attained the age of eighteen years or more, is eligible and liable to serve as a juror on juries in the Superior Court of Justice in the county in which he or she resides. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 2; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

INELIGIBILITY TO SERVE AS JUROR

INELIGIBLE OCCUPATIONS
3. (1) The following persons are ineligible to serve as jurors:
1. Every member of the Privy Council of Canada or the Executive Council of Ontario.
2. Every member of the Senate, the House of Commons of Canada or the Assembly.
3. Every judge and every justice of the peace.
4. Every barrister and solicitor and every student-at-law.
5. Every legally qualified medical practitioner and veterinary surgeon who is actively engaged in practice and every coroner.
6. Every person engaged in the enforcement of law including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, sheriffs, wardens of any penitentiary, superintendents, jailers or keepers of prisons, correctional institutions or lockups, sheriff’s officers, police officers, firefighters who are regularly employed by a fire department for the purposes of subsection 41 (1) of the Fire Protection and Prevention Act, 1997, and officers of a court of justice. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 3 (1); 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (1); 1997, c. 4, s. 82.

(2) Repealed: 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (2).

CONNECTION WITH COURT ACTION AT SAME SITTINGS

(3) Every person who has been summoned as a witness or is likely to be called as a witness in a civil or criminal proceeding or has an interest in an action is ineligible to serve as a juror at any sittings at which the proceeding or action might be tried. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 3 (3).

PREVIOUS SERVICE

(4) Every person who, at any time within three years preceding the year for which the jury roll is prepared, has attended court for jury service in response to a summons after selection from the roll prepared under this Act or any predecessor thereof is ineligible to serve as a juror in that year. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 3 (4); 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (3).

INELIGIBILITY FOR PERSONAL REASONS

4. A person is ineligible to serve as a juror who,

   (a) has a physical or mental disability that would seriously impair his or her ability to discharge the duties of a juror; or

   (b) has been convicted of an offence that may be prosecuted by indictment, unless the person has subsequently been granted a pardon. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 4; 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (1).

PREPARATION OF JURY ROLLS

DUTY OF SHERIFF

NUMBER OF JURORS ON ROLL

5. (1) The sheriff for a county shall on or before the 15th day of September in each year determine for the ensuing year for the county,

   (a) the number of jurors that will be required for each sittings of the Superior Court of Justice;

   (b) the number of persons that will be required for selection from the jury roll for the purposes of any other Act; and

   (c) the aggregate number of persons that will be so required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 5 (1); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

NUMBER OF JURORS IN DISTRICTS

(2) In a territorial district, after determining the number of persons that will be required for service during the ensuing year, the sheriff shall fix the total number of persons that shall be selected from municipalities, and the total number that shall be selected from territory without municipal organization. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 5 (2).

TRANSMISSION OF RESOLUTIONS
(3) The sheriff shall forthwith upon making the determination under subsection (1) certify and transmit,
(a) to the Director of Assessment,
   (i) a copy of the determination declaring the aggregate number of persons required for the jury roll in the county in the ensuing year, and
   (ii) a statement of the numbers of jury service notices to be mailed to persons in the county; and
(b) to the local registrar of the Superior Court of Justice, a copy of the determination for the number of jurors under clause (1) (a). R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 5 (3); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

JURY SERVICE NOTICES

6. (1) The Director of Assessment shall in each year on or before the 31st day of October cause a jury service notice, together with a return to the jury service notice in the form prescribed by the regulations and a prepaid return envelope addressed to the sheriff for the county, to be mailed by first class mail to the number of persons in each county specified in the sheriff’s statement, and selected in the manner provided for in this section. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (1).

SELECTION OF PERSONS NOTIFIED

(2) The persons to whom jury service notices are mailed under this section shall be selected by the Director of Assessment at random from persons who, from information obtained at the most recent enumeration of the inhabitants of the county under section 15 of the Assessment Act,
    (a) at the time of the enumeration, resided in the county and were Canadian citizens; and
    (b) in the year preceding the year for which the jury is selected, are of or will attain the age of eighteen years or more, and the number of persons selected from each municipality in the county shall bear approximately the same proportion to the total number selected for the county as the total number of persons eligible for selection in the municipality bears to the total number eligible for selection in the county, as determined by the enumeration. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (2).

APPLICATION OF SUBS. (2) TO MUNICIPALITIES IN DISTRICTS

(3) In a territorial district for the purposes of subsection (2), all the municipalities in the district shall together be treated in the same manner as a county from which the number of jurors required is the number fixed under subsection 5(2) to be selected from municipalities. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (3).

ADDRESS FOR MAILING

(4) The jury service notice to a person under this section shall be mailed to the person at the address shown in the most recent enumeration of the inhabitants of the county under section 15 of the Assessment Act.
    R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (4).

RETURN TO JURY SERVICE NOTICE

(5) Every person to whom a jury service notice is mailed in accordance with this section shall accurately and truthfully complete the return and shall mail it to the sheriff for the county within five days after receipt thereof. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (5).
WHEN SERVICE DEEMED MADE
(6) For the purposes of subsection (5), the notice shall be deemed to have been received on the third day after the day of mailing unless the person to whom the notice is mailed establishes that he or she, acting in good faith, through absence, accident, illness or other cause beyond his or her control did not receive the notice or order, or did not receive the notice or order until a later date. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (6).

LIST OF NOTICES GIVEN
(7) The Director of Assessment shall furnish to the sheriff for the county a list of persons in the county arranged alphabetically to whom jury service notices were mailed under this section forthwith after such mailing and the list received by the sheriff purporting to be certified by the Director of Assessment is, without proof of the office or signature of the Director of Assessment, receivable in evidence in any proceeding as proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, of the mailing of jury service notices to the persons shown on the list. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (7).

INDIAN RESERVES
(8) In the selecting of persons for entry in the jury roll in a county or district in which an Indian reserve is situate, the sheriff shall select names of eligible persons inhabiting the reserve in the same manner as if the reserve were a municipality and, for the purpose, the sheriff may obtain the names of inhabitants of the reserve from any record available. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 6 (8).

SHERIFF TO PREPARE JURY ROLL
7. The sheriff shall in each year prepare a roll called the jury roll in the form prescribed by the regulations. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 7.

ENTRY OF NAMES IN JURY ROLL
8. (1) The sheriff shall open the returns to jury service notices received by the sheriff and shall cause the name, address and occupation of each person making such a return, who is shown by the return to be eligible for jury service, to be entered in the jury roll alphabetically arranged and numbered consecutively. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 8 (1); 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (4).

ENGLISH, FRENCH AND BILINGUAL JURORS
(2) The jury roll prepared under subsection (1) shall be divided into three parts, as follows:

1. A part listing the persons who appear, by the returns to jury service notices, to speak, read and understand English.
2. A part listing the persons who appear, by the returns to jury service notices, to speak, read and understand French.
3. A part listing the persons who appear, by the returns to jury service notices, to speak, read and understand both English and French. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (5).

OMISSION OF NAMES
(3) The sheriff may, with the written approval of a judge of the Superior Court of Justice, omit the name from the roll where it appears such person will be unable to attend for jury duty. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 8 (3); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).
SUPPLEMENTARY NAMES
(4) The sheriff may request the Director of Assessment to mail such number of additional jury service notices and forms of returns to jury service notice as in the opinion of the sheriff are required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 8 (4).

SUPPLYING OF SUPPLEMENTARY NAMES
(5) Upon receipt of a request from the sheriff under subsection (4), the Director of Assessment shall forthwith carry out such request and for such purpose section 6 applies with necessary modifications with respect to the additional jury service notices requested by the sheriff to be mailed. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 8 (5).

SELECTION FROM UNORGANIZED TERRITORY
(6) In a territorial district, the sheriff shall select names of eligible persons who reside in the district outside territory with municipal organization in the numbers fixed under subsection 5(2) and for the purpose may have recourse to the latest polling list prepared and certified for such territory, and to any assessment or collector’s roll prepared for school purposes and may obtain names from any other record available. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 8 (6).

CERTIFICATION OF ROLL
9. As soon as the jury roll has been completed but not later than the 31st day of December in each year, the sheriff shall certify the roll to be the proper roll prepared as the law directs and shall deliver notice of the certification to a judge of the Superior Court of Justice, but a judge of the court may extend the time for certification for such reasons as he or she considers sufficient. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 9; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

EXTENSION OF TIMES
10. The Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Justice may, upon the request of the sheriff for a county, extend any times prescribed by this Act in connection with the preparation of the jury roll for the county to such date as the Chief Justice considers appropriate and may authorize the continued use of the latest jury roll until the dates so fixed. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 10; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 2 (1).

ADDITIONS TO ROLL BY SHERIFF
11. (1) Where there are no persons or not a sufficient number of persons on the proper jury roll, or where there is no jury roll for the year in existence, the sheriff may supply names of eligible jurors from the jury rolls for the three nearest preceding years for which there is a jury roll or certified copy thereof in existence. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 11 (1).

CERTIFICATION OF ADDITIONS BY SHERIFF
(2) The names supplied to the jury roll under this section shall be entered thereon and certified by the sheriff. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 11 (2).

ISSUANCE OF PRECEPTS
12. A judge of the Superior Court of Justice may issue precepts in the form prescribed by the regulations to the sheriff for the return of such number of jurors as the sheriff has determined as the number to be drafted and returned or such greater or lesser number as in his or her opinion is required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 12; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).
TWO OR MORE SETS OF JURORS
13. (1) Where a judge of the Superior Court of Justice considers it necessary that the jurors to form the panel for a sittings of the Superior Court of Justice be summoned in more than one set, the judge may direct the sheriff to return such number of jurors in such number of sets on such day for each set as he or she thinks fit. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 13 (1); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

SHERIFF TO DIVIDE JURORS INTO SETS
(2) The sheriff shall divide such jurors into as many sets as are directed, and shall in the summons to every juror specify at what time his or her attendance will be required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 13 (2).

EACH SET A SEPARATE PANEL
(3) Each set shall for all purposes be deemed a separate panel. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 13 (3).

ADDITIONAL JURORS
14. (1) A judge of the Superior Court of Justice, after the issue of the precept, at any time before or during the sittings of the court, by order under his or her hand and seal, may direct the sheriff to return an additional number of jurors. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 14 (1); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

DUTY OF SHERIFF AS TO DRAFTING ADDITIONAL NUMBER OF JURORS
(2) The sheriff, upon the receipt of an order under subsection (1), shall forthwith draft such additional number of jurors in the manner provided by this Act, and shall add their names to the panel list, and shall forthwith thereafter summon them, and where there are not a sufficient number of jurors on the jury roll for the purpose of the additions, section 11 applies. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 14 (2).

HOW SHERIFFS TO DRAFT PANELS OF JURORS
15. Every sheriff to whom a precept for the return of jurors is directed shall, to such precept, return a panel list of the names of the jurors contained in the jury roll, whose names shall be drafted from such roll in the manner hereinafter mentioned. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 15.

SHERIFF TO DRAFT PANEL
16. Upon receipt of the precept, the sheriff shall post up in his or her office written notice of the day, hour and place at which the panel of jurors will be drafted, and the sheriff shall draft the panel by ballot from the jury roll in the presence of a justice of the peace who shall attend upon reasonable notice from the sheriff. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 16.

HOW SHERIFF TO PREPARE A PANEL
17. (1) Before proceeding to draft a panel of jurors from a jury roll, the sheriff shall prepare a proper title or heading for the list of jurors to be returned, to which he or she shall fix an appropriate number according as such panel is the first, second, third or subsequent panel drafted from such jury roll, and the title or heading shall set forth the number of jurors to be returned. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 17 (1).

BALLOTS FOR DRAFTING PANEL
(2) The sheriff shall then append to such title or heading a list of numbers from “1” forward to the number required, and shall prepare a set of ballots of uniform and convenient size containing the same number of ballots as there are numbers on the jury roll, allowing one number to each ballot, which number shall be printed or written on it, and the sheriff shall then proceed to draft the panel of jurors. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 17 (2).
DRAFTING OF PANEL

18. (1) The sheriff shall draft the panel by drawing at random the ballots from a container in the presence of the justice of the peace. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 18 (1).

PANEL LIST

(2) The names of the persons so drafted, arranged alphabetically, with their places of residence and occupations shall then be transcribed by the sheriff, with a reference to the number of each name on the jury roll, and each name shall be thereupon marked by the sheriff or the sheriff’s deputy upon the jury roll. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 18 (2).

(3) Repealed: 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (6).

IDEM

(4) The panel list so alphabetically arranged and numbered, with a short statement of the precept in obedience to which it has been drafted, the date and place of such drafting, and the names of the sheriff, or the sheriff’s deputy and the justice of the peace, present at such drafting, shall then be recorded and attested by the signatures of the sheriff, or the sheriff’s deputy and the justice of the peace, and such panel list shall be retained in the custody of the sheriff. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 18 (4).

AUTOMATED PROCEDURE FOR DRAFTING PANEL

18.1 (1) Instead of following the procedure described in sections 15 to 18 to draft a panel of jurors, the sheriff may use any electronic or other automated procedure to accomplish the same result. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (7).

NON-APPLICATION OF CERTAIN REQUIREMENTS

(2) When a jury panel is being drafted under subsection (1),

(a) notice need not be posted as set out in section 16;

(b) the participation of a justice of the peace, as referred to in section 16 and subsections 18 (1) and (4), is not required. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (7).

CRIMINAL RECORD CHECK

18.2 (1) For the purposes of confirming whether clause 4 (b) applies in respect of a person selected under section 18 or 18.1 for inclusion on a jury panel, the sheriff may, in accordance with this section and the regulations, request that a criminal record check, prepared from national data on the Canadian Police Information Centre database, be conducted concerning the person. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (2).

TIMING

(2) A criminal record check concerning a person that is requested under subsection (1) shall be obtained by the sheriff before he or she finalizes the jury panel on which the person is to be included. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (2).

COLLECTION, USE AND DISCLOSURE OF PERSONAL INFORMATION BY SHERIFF

(3) Subject to any restrictions or conditions set out in the regulations, the sheriff shall collect, directly or indirectly, use and disclose such personal information respecting a person who is the subject of a criminal record check under subsection (1) as is required for the purposes of this section. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (2).
AGREEMENT WITH POLICE FORCE
(4) The sheriff may enter into an agreement with a police force that is prescribed by the regulations respecting,

(a) the preparation of a criminal record check by the police force for the purposes of this section; and

(b) the collection, use and disclosure of personal information by the police force for the purposes of the criminal record check. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (2).

REMOVAL AND REPLACEMENT
(5) If, on review of a person's criminal record check, the sheriff determines that clause 4 (b) applies in respect of the person, the sheriff shall,

(a) remove the person from the jury panel on which the person was to have been included;

(b) remove the person's name and other information from the jury roll for the applicable year; and

(c) draft, in accordance with section 18 or 18.1, as the case may be, another person for the jury panel to replace the person who was removed. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (2).

NOTICE
SUMMONING JURORS 21 DAYS BEFORE ATTENDANCE REQUIRED
19. (1) The sheriff shall summon every person drafted to serve on juries by sending to the person by ordinary mail a notice in writing in the form prescribed by the regulations under the hand of the sheriff at least twenty-one days before the day upon which the person is to attend, but when the sheriff is directed to draft and summon additional jurors under this Act, such twenty-one days service is not necessary. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 19 (1).

EXCUSING OF JURORS
(2) The sheriff may excuse any person summoned for a jury sittings on the ground,

(a) of illness; or

but unless a judge of the Superior Court of Justice directs otherwise and despite any other provision of this Act, such person shall be included in a panel to be returned for a sittings later in the year or, where there are not further sittings in that year, in a panel to be returned for a sittings in the year next following. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 19 (2); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

SECRECY OF JURY ROLL AND PANEL
20. The jury roll and every list containing the names of the jury drafted for any panel shall be kept under lock and key by the sheriff, and except in so far as may be necessary in order to prepare the panel lists, and serve the jury summons, shall not be disclosed by the sheriff, the sheriff's deputy, officer, clerk, or by the justice of the peace mentioned in section 16, or by any other person, until ten days before the sittings of the court for which the panel has been drafted, and during such period of ten days, the sheriff, or the sheriff's deputy, shall permit the inspection at all reasonable hours of the jury roll and of the panel list or copy thereof in his or her custody by litigants or accused persons or their solicitors and shall furnish the litigants or accused persons or their solicitors, upon request and payment of a fee of $2, with a copy of any such panel list. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 20.
ATTENDANCE OF JURORS POSTPONED OR NOT REQUIRED COUNTERMAND WHERE NO JURY CASES
21. (1) Where there is no business requiring the attendance of a jury at a sittings in respect of which a precept has been issued,
   (a) the local registrar, where the sittings is for the trial of actions; or
   (b) the Crown Attorney, where the sittings is for the trial of criminal prosecutions, shall, at least five clear days before the day upon which the sittings is to commence, give notice in writing to the sheriff in the form prescribed by the regulations that the attendance of the jurors is not required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 21 (1).

POSTPONEMENT OF DATE FOR ATTENDANCE OF JURORS
(2) Where the business of the court does not require the attendance of the jurors until a day after the day upon which the sittings is to commence, the appropriate officer determined under subsection (1) shall, at least five clear days before the day upon which the sittings is to commence, give notice in writing to the sheriff in the form prescribed by the regulations that the attendance of the jurors is not required until such later day as is specified in the notice. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 21 (2).

NOTICE TO JURORS
(3) Subject to subsection (4), where, upon receipt of such notice it appears to the sheriff that the attendance of jurors is not required or not required until a later date, the sheriff shall forthwith by registered mail or otherwise, as he or she considers expedient, notify in the form prescribed by the regulations each person summoned to serve as a juror that attendance at the sittings is not required or is not required until the day specified in the notice. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 21 (3).

SHERIFF MUST ASCERTAIN THAT THERE ARE NO PRISONERS IN CUSTODY
(4) In the case of a sittings for the hearing of criminal proceedings, the sheriff shall not give the notice mentioned in subsection (3) unless he or she is satisfied that there is no prisoner in custody awaiting trial at the sittings. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 21 (4).

DIVISION OF PANEL
22. A judge of the Superior Court of Justice who considers it necessary may direct that the jurors summoned for a sittings of the Court be divided into two or more sets as he or she may direct, and each set shall for all purposes be deemed a separate panel. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 22; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

MERGER
22.1 A judge of the Superior Court of Justice who considers it necessary may direct that two or more panels of jurors, including panels established by division under section 22, be merged into a single panel. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (8); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 2 (2).

EXCUSING OF JUROR RELIGIOUS REASONS
23. (1) A person summoned for jury duty may be excused by a judge from service as a juror on the ground that service as a juror is incompatible with the beliefs or practices of a religion or religious order to which the person belongs. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 23 (1).
ILLNESS OR HARDSHIP
(2) A person summoned for jury duty may be excused by a judge from attending the sittings on the ground,
   (a) of illness; or
   (b) that serving as a juror may cause serious hardships or loss to the person or others, and the judge may excuse the person from all service as a juror, or the judge may direct that the service of a person excused be postponed and that despite any provision of this Act, the person be included in a panel to be returned for a sittings later in that year or in a panel to be returned for a sittings in the year next following. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 23 (2).

APPLICATION FOR EXCUSING
(3) A person summoned for jury service may be excused under subsection (1) or (2),
   (a) before the day for attendance, by any judge of the Superior Court of Justice;
   (b) on or after the day for attendance, by the judge presiding at the sittings, and the application to be excused may be made to the sheriff. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 23 (3); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

RELEASE AND TRANSFER OF JURORS
RELEASE BEFORE SITTINGS
24. (1) Where jurors are summoned for a jury sittings, a judge of the Superior Court of Justice may, at any time before the sittings, release from or postpone service of any number of jurors summoned for the sittings. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 24 (1); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

RELEASE DURING SITTINGS
(2) The judge presiding at the sittings may release from or postpone service of any number of jurors summoned for the sittings. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 24 (2).

TRANSFER TO ANOTHER PANEL
(3) Jurors released from service at a sittings under this section may be resummoned by the sheriff for service at any other sittings, held concurrently with or immediately following the sittings from which they were released. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 24 (3).

CONSTITUTION OF PANEL
(4) Where jurors have been released from service or their service has been postponed under this section, the remaining jurors constitute the panel, and jurors recalled or resummoned under this section form part of the panel to which they are added. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 24 (4).

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE MAY ISSUE PRECEPTS AS HERETOFORE
25. Subject to this Act, the Superior Court of Justice and the judges thereof have the same power and authority as heretofore in issuing any precept, or in making any award or order, orally or otherwise, for the return of a jury for the trial of any issue before the court, or for amending or enlarging the panel of jurors returned for the trial of any such issue, and the return to any precept, award or order shall be made in the manner heretofore used and accustomed, and the jurors shall, as heretofore, be returned from the body of the county, and shall be eligible according to this Act. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 25; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).
ACTIONS TRIED BY JURY

WHEN ACTIONS TO BE ENTERED FOR TRIAL

26. Subject to any order of a judge of the Superior Court of Justice, actions to be tried by a jury shall be entered for trial not later than six clear days before the first day of the sittings. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 26; 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

DRAWING JURY AT TRIAL

EMPANELLING JURY AT THE TRIAL

27. (1) The name of every person summoned to attend as a juror, with the person’s place of residence, occupation, and number on the panel list, shall be written distinctly by the sheriff on a card or paper, as nearly as may be of the form and size following:

   15. DAVID BOOTH
   OF LOT NO. 11, IN THE 7TH CON. OF ALBION

and the names so written shall, under the direction of the sheriff, be put together in a container to be provided by the sheriff for that purpose, and he or she shall deliver it to the clerk of the court. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 27 (1).

HOW THE CLERK IS TO PROCEED TO DRAW NAMES

(2) Where an issue is brought on to be tried, or damages are to be assessed by a jury, the clerk shall, in open court, cause the container to be shaken so as sufficiently to mix the names, and shall then draw out six of the cards or papers, one after another, causing the container to be shaken after the drawing of each name, and if any juror whose name is so drawn does not appear or is challenged and set aside, then such further number until six jurors are drawn, who do appear, and who, after all just causes of challenge allowed, remain as fair and indifferent, and the first six jurors so drawn, appearing and approved as indifferent, their names being noted in the minute book of the clerk of the court, shall be sworn, and shall be the jury to try the issue or to assess the damages. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 27 (2).

NAMES DRAWN TO BE KEPT APART, ETC.

(3) The cards or papers containing the names of persons so drawn and sworn shall be kept apart until the jury has given in its verdict, and it has been recorded, or until the jury has been by consent of the parties, or by leave of the court, discharged, and shall then be returned to the container there to be kept with the other cards or papers remaining therein. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 27 (3).

AUTOMATED PROCEDURE FOR EMPANELLING JURY IN CIVIL CASES

27.1 Where a trial is in respect of a civil proceeding, instead of following the procedure described in section 27 to select a jury, any electronic or other automated procedure may be used to accomplish the same result. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (3).

SELECTION OF JURIES IN ADVANCE

28. A jury may be selected in accordance with section 27 or 27.1 at any time before the trial of an issue or assessment of damages directed by the judge presiding at the sittings and shall attend for service upon the summons of the sheriff. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 28; 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (4).
SEVERAL CAUSES MAY BE TRIED IN SUCCESSION WITH THE SAME JURY

29. (1) Despite sections 27, 27.1 and 28, unless a party objects, the court may try any issue or assess damages with a jury previously selected to try any other issue or to assess damages. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (5).

SAME

(2) Despite subsection (1), unless a party objects, the court may order any juror from the previously selected jury whom both parties consent to withdraw or who may be justly challenged or excused by the court, to retire and may cause another juror to be selected in accordance with section 27 or 27.1, as the case may be, in his or her place, in which case the issue shall be tried or the damages assessed with the remaining members of the previously selected jury and the new juror or jurors, as the case may be, who appear and are approved as indifferent. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (5).

IF A FULL JURY DOES NOT APPEAR SUPPLEMENTARY JURORS MAY BE APPOINTED

30. (1) Where a full jury does not appear at a sittings for civil matters, or where, after the appearance of a full jury, by challenge of any of the parties, the jury is likely to remain untaken for default of jurors, the court may command the sheriff to name and appoint, as supplementary jurors, so many of such other able persons of the county then present, or who can be found, as will make up a full jury, and the sheriff shall return such persons to serve on the jury. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 30 (1).

ADDING NAMES OF SUPPLEMENTARY JURORS

(2) Where a full jury does not appear, the names of the persons so returned shall be added to the panel returned upon the precept. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 30 (2).

THE SHERIFF TO NOTE ON ROLLS NAMES OF JURORS WHO DO NOT SERVE

31. Immediately after the sittings of the court, the sheriff shall note on the jury roll from which the panel of jurors returned to the sittings was drafted opposite the names of the jurors, the non-attendance or default of every juror who has not attended until discharged by the court. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 31.

CHALLENGES

LACK OF ELIGIBILITY

32. If a person not eligible is drawn as a juror for the trial of an issue in any proceeding, the want of eligibility is a good cause for challenge. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 32.

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES IN CIVIL CASES

33. In any civil proceeding, the plaintiff or plaintiffs, on one side, and the defendant or defendants, on the other, may challenge peremptorily any four of the jurors drawn to serve on the trial, and such right of challenge extends to the Crown when a party. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 33.

RATEPAYERS, OFFICERS, ETC., OF MUNICIPALITY MAY BE CHALLENGED

34. In a proceeding to which a municipal corporation, other than a county, is a party, every ratepayer, and every officer or servant of the corporation is, for that reason, liable to challenge as a juror. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 34.
General Payments Under Administration of Justice Act

Fees Payable to Jurors and Justices of the Peace

35. (1) Such fees and allowances as are prescribed under the Administration of Justice Act shall be paid to,

(a) every juror attending a sittings of the Superior Court of Justice; and

(b) the justice of the peace in attendance for each panel drafted under section 16. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 35 (1); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

Sums to be Paid with Record When Entered for Trial in Jury Cases

(2) With every record entered for trial of issues or assessment of damages by a jury in the Superior Court of Justice there shall be paid to the local registrar of the Superior Court of Justice such sum as is prescribed under the Administration of Justice Act, and the record shall not be entered unless such sum is first paid. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 35 (2); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

36. (1) The clerk of the court or the sheriff or sheriff’s officer shall, at the opening of the court and before any other business is proceeded with, call the names of the jurors, and the sheriff or sheriff’s officer shall record those who are present or absent. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 36 (1).

Record of Fees Paid

(2) The sheriff shall keep a record of the payment of fees to jurors for attending sittings of a court. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 36 (2).

When Fees Payable

(3) A juror is not entitled to fees or expenses in respect of days that he or she does not or is not required to attend. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 36 (3).

Jury Areas

36.1 (1) A jury area established under clause 37 (c) shall be treated as a separate county for the purposes of this Act. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (9).

Court Facilities

(2) If there are no court facilities in a jury area, a regional senior judge of the Superior Court of Justice may order residents of the jury area who are summoned for jury duty to attend at a court outside the jury area. 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (9); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1).

Regulations

37. The Attorney General may make regulations,

(a) prescribing any form required or permitted by this Act to be prescribed by the regulations;

(b) prescribing the manner of keeping jury rolls and lists of jury panels and records thereof and requiring and prescribing the form of the certification or authentication of entries therein;
(b.1) setting out restrictions or conditions that apply to the collection, use or disclosure of personal information by the sheriff, for the purposes of subsection 18.2 (3);

(b.2) prescribing a police force for the purposes of subsection 18.2 (4);

(c) establishing jury areas, consisting of parts of existing counties, for the purposes of section 36.1. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 37; 1994, c. 27, s. 48 (10); 2009, c. 33, Sched. 2, s. 38 (6, 7).

OFFENCES

38. (1) Every person who,

(a) wilfully makes or causes to be made any alteration in any roll or panel or in any certified copy thereof except in accordance with this Act;

(b) falsely certifies any roll or panel; or

(c) influences or attempts to influence the selection of persons for inclusion in or omission from any jury roll or panel, except in a proper procedure under this Act, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than two years, or to both. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 38 (1).

IDEM

(2) Every sheriff, or clerk or registrar of a court, who refuses to perform any duty imposed on him or her by this Act, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $5,000. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 38 (2).

IDEM

(3) Every person who is required to complete a return to a jury service notice and who,

(a) without reasonable excuse fails to complete the return or mail it to the sheriff as required by subsection 6(5); or

(b) knowingly gives false or misleading information in the return, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than six months, or to both. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 38 (3).

EVIDENCE OF NOT MAILING

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3), where the sheriff fails to receive a return to a jury service notice within five days from the date on which it was required by this Act to be mailed, such failure is proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the person required to mail it to the sheriff failed to do so in the time required. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 38 (4).

CERTIFICATE AS EVIDENCE

(5) A statement as to the receipt or non-receipt of a return to a jury service notice purporting to be certified by the sheriff is, without proof of the appointment or signature of the sheriff, receivable in evidence as proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, of the facts stated therein in any prosecution under subsection (3). R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 38 (5).
CONTEMPT OF COURT

39. Every person is in contempt of court who, without reasonable excuse,
   (a) having been duly summoned to attend on a jury, does not attend in pursuance of the summons, or being there called does not answer to his or her name; or
   (b) being a juror or supplementary juror, after having been called, is present but does not appear, or after appearing wilfully withdraws from the presence of the court; or
   (c) being a sheriff, wilfully empanels and returns to serve on a jury a person whose name has not been duly drawn upon the panel in the manner prescribed in this Act; or
   (d) being a registrar or other officer wilfully records the appearance of a person so summoned and returned who has not actually appeared. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 39.

IDEM, TAMPERING WITH JURORS

40. (1) Every person is in contempt of court who, being interested in an action that is or is to be entered for trial or may be tried in the court, or being the solicitor, counsel, agent or emissary of such person, before or during the sittings or at any time after a juror on the jury panel for such court has been summoned knowingly, directly or indirectly, speaks to or consults with the juror respecting such action or any matter or thing relating thereto. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 40 (1).

REVOCATION OR SUSPENSION OF LICENCE, ETC.

(2) A solicitor, barrister or student-at-law who is guilty of such offence may, in addition to any other penalty, have his or her licence under the Law Society Act to practise law or provide legal services revoked or suspended, or his or her name may be erased from the register of the Law Society or removed from the register for a limited time, by the Superior Court of Justice upon motion at the instance and in the name of the Attorney General. 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 114.

EXCEPTION WHERE JUROR IS A PARTY OR WITNESS

(3) This section does not apply where a juror is also a party to or a known witness or interested in the action or is otherwise ineligible as a juror in the action, nor to anything that may properly take place in the course of the trial or conduct of the action. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 40 (3).

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FROM EMPLOYMENT

41. (1) Every employer shall grant to an employee who is summoned for jury service a leave of absence, with or without pay, sufficient for the purpose of the discharge of the employee’s duties, and, upon the employee’s return, the employer shall reinstate the employee to his or her position, or provide the employee with alternative work of a comparable nature at not less than his or her wages at the time the leave of absence began and without loss of seniority or benefits accrued to the commencement of the leave of absence. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 41 (1).

LIABILITY OF EMPLOYER FOR BREACH

(2) An employer who fails to comply with subsection (1) is liable to the employee for any loss occasioned by the breach of the obligation. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 41 (2).
PENALTY FOR REPRISALS
(3) Every employer who, directly or indirectly,

(a) threatens to cause or causes an employee loss of position, or employment; or

(b) threatens to impose or imposes on an employee any pecuniary or other penalty, because of the employee’s response to a summons, or service as a juror, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than three months, or to both. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 41 (3).

POSTING UP COPIES OF S. 139 (2, 3) OF CRIMINAL CODE
42. The sheriff shall at the sittings of the Superior Court of Justice for trials by jury post up in the court room and jury rooms and in the general entrance hall of the court house printed copies in conspicuous type of subsections 139 (2) and (3) of the Criminal Code (Canada) and subsection 40 (1) of this Act.

SAVING OF FORMER POWERS OF COURT AND JUDGES EXCEPT AS ALTERED
43. Nothing in this Act alters, abridges or affects any power or authority that any court or judge has, or any practice or form in regard to trials by jury, juries or jurors, except in those cases only where such power or authority, practice or form is repealed or altered, or is inconsistent with any of the provisions of this

OMISSIONS TO OBSERVE THIS ACT NOT TO VITIATE THE VERDICT
44. (1) The omission to observe any of the provisions of this Act respecting the eligibility, selection, balloting and distribution of jurors, the preparation of the jury roll or the drafting of panels from the jury roll is not a ground for impeaching or quashing a verdict or judgment in any action. R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s.
44 (1).

PANEL DEEMED PROPERLY SELECTED
(2) Subject to sections 32 and 34, a jury panel returned by the sheriff for the purposes of this Act shall be deemed to be properly selected for the purposes of the service of the jurors in any matter or proceeding.
R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 44 (2).

DEATH WHILE RESTRAINED IN SECURE TREATMENT PROGRAM

(4.8) Where a person dies while being restrained and while committed or admitted to a secure treatment program within the meaning of Part VI of the Child and Family Services Act, the person in charge of the program shall immediately give notice of the death to a coroner and the coroner shall hold an inquest upon the body. 2009, c. 15, s. 6 (4).
NOTICE OF DEATH RESULTING FROM ACCIDENT AT OR IN CONSTRUCTION PROJECT, MINING PLANT OR MINE
(5) Where a worker dies as a result of an accident occurring in the course of the worker’s employment at or in a construction project, mining plant or mine, including a pit or quarry, the person in charge of such project, mining plant or mine shall immediately give notice of the death to a coroner and the coroner shall hold an inquest upon the body. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 10 (5); 2009, c. 15, s. 6 (5).

CERTIFICATE AS EVIDENCE
(6) A statement as to the notification or non-notification of a coroner under this section, purporting to be certified by the coroner is without proof of the appointment or signature of the coroner, receivable in evidence as proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary of the facts stated therein for all purposes in any action, proceeding or prosecution. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 10 (6).

INTERFERENCE WITH BODY
11. No person who has reason to believe that a person died in any of the circumstances mentioned in section 10 shall interfere with or alter the body or its condition in any way until the coroner so directs by a warrant. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 11.

POWER OF CORONER TO TAKE CHARGE OF WRECKAGE
12. (1) Where a coroner has issued a warrant to take possession of the body of a person who has met death by violence in a wreck, the coroner may, with the approval of the Chief Coroner, take charge of the wreckage and place one or more police officers in charge of it so as to prevent persons from disturbing it until the jury at the inquest has viewed it, or the coroner has made such examination as he or she considers necessary. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 12 (1).

VIEW TO BE EXPEDITED
(2) The jury or coroner, as the case may be, shall view the wreckage at the earliest moment possible. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 12 (2).

SHIPMENT OF BODIES OUTSIDE ONTARIO
13. (1) Subject to section 14, no person shall accept for shipment or ship or take a dead body from any place in Ontario to any place outside Ontario unless a certificate of a coroner has been obtained certifying that there exists no reason for further examination of the body. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 13 (1).

FEE FOR CERTIFICATE
(2) An applicant for a certificate under subsection (1) shall pay to the coroner such fee as is prescribed therefor. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 13 (2).

EMBALMING, ETC., PROHIBITED
(3) No person who has reason to believe that a dead body will be shipped or taken to a place outside Ontario shall embalm or make any alteration to the body or apply any chemical to the body, internally or externally, until the certificate required by subsection (1) has been issued. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 13 (3).

TRANSPORTATION OF A BODY OUT OF ONTARIO FOR POST MORTEM
14. A coroner may in writing authorize the transportation of a body out of Ontario for post mortem examination and, in such case a provision in any Act or regulation requiring embalming and preparation by a funeral director does not apply. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 14.
CORONER’S INVESTIGATION

15. (1) Where a coroner is informed that there is in his or her jurisdiction the body of a person and that there is reason to believe that the person died in any of the circumstances mentioned in section 10, the coroner shall issue a warrant to take possession of the body and shall examine the body and make such investigation as, in the opinion of the coroner, is necessary in the public interest to enable the coroner,

(a) to determine the answers to the questions set out in subsection 31 (1);
(b) to determine whether or not an inquest is necessary; and
(c) to collect and analyze information about the death in order to prevent further deaths in similar circumstances. 2009, c. 15, s. 7 (1).

IDEM

(2) Where the Chief Coroner has reason to believe that a person died in any of the circumstances mentioned in section 10 and no warrant has been issued to take possession of the body, he or she may issue the warrant or direct any coroner to do so. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 15 (2).

JURISDICTION

(3) After the issue of the warrant, no other coroner shall issue a warrant or interfere in the case, except the Chief Coroner. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 15 (3); 2009, c. 15, s. 7 (2).

EXPERT ASSISTANCE

(4) Subject to the approval of the Chief Coroner, a coroner may obtain assistance or retain expert services for all or any part of his or her investigation or inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 15 (4).

NO WARRANT

(5) A coroner may proceed with an investigation without taking possession of the body where the body has been destroyed in whole or in part or is lying in a place from which it cannot be recovered or has been removed from Ontario. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 15 (5).

INVESTIGATIVE POWERS

16. (1) A coroner may,

(a) examine or take possession of any dead body, or both; and
(b) enter and inspect any place where a dead body is and any place from which the coroner has reasonable grounds for believing the body was removed. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (1); 2009, c. 15, s. 8.

IDEM

(2) A coroner who believes on reasonable and probable grounds that to do so is necessary for the purposes of the investigation may,

(a) inspect any place in which the deceased person was, or in which the coroner has reasonable grounds to believe the deceased person was, prior to his or her death;
(b) inspect and extract information from any records or writings relating to the deceased or his or her circumstances and reproduce such copies therefrom as the coroner believes necessary;
(c) seize anything that the coroner has reasonable grounds to believe is material to the purposes of the investigation. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (2).
DELEGATION OF POWERS
(3) A coroner may authorize a legally qualified medical practitioner or a police officer to exercise all or any of the coroner’s powers under subsection (1). R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (3).

IDEM
(4) A coroner may, where in his or her opinion it is necessary for the purposes of the investigation, authorize a legally qualified medical practitioner or a police officer to exercise all or any of the coroner’s powers under clauses (2) (a), (b) and (c) but, where such power is conditional on the belief of the coroner, the requisite belief shall be that of the coroner personally. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (4).

RETURN OF THINGS SEIZED
(5) Where a coroner seizes anything under clause (2) (c), he or she shall place it in the custody of a police officer for safekeeping and shall return it to the person from whom it was seized as soon as is practicable after the conclusion of the investigation or, where there is an inquest, of the inquest, unless the coroner is authorized or required by law to dispose of it otherwise. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (5).

OBSTRUCTION OF CORONER
(6) No person shall knowingly,
(a) hinder, obstruct or interfere with or attempt to hinder, obstruct or interfere with; or
(b) furnish with false information or refuse or neglect to furnish information to, a coroner in the performance of his or her duties or a person authorized by the coroner in connection with an investigation. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 16 (6).

APPOINTMENT OF PERSONS WITH CORONERS’ INVESTIGATIVE POWERS AND DUTIES
16.1 (1) The Chief Coroner may appoint any person, in accordance with the regulations, to exercise the investigative powers and duties of a coroner. 2009, c. 15, s. 9.

SAME
(2) Subject to subsection (3) and the regulations, this Act applies with necessary modifications to a person appointed under subsection (1) as if he or she were a coroner. 2009, c. 15, s. 9.

LIMITATION
(3) A person appointed under subsection (1) cannot determine whether or not an inquest is necessary or hold an inquest. 2009, c. 15, s. 9.

REPORT
(4) A person appointed under subsection (1) shall report his or her findings to the Chief Coroner or a coroner specified by the Chief Coroner, who shall then determine whether or not an inquest is necessary. 2009, c. 15, s. 9.

TRANSFER OF INVESTIGATION
17. (1) A coroner may at any time transfer an investigation to another coroner where in his or her opinion the investigation may be continued or conducted more conveniently by that other coroner or for any other good and sufficient reason. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 17 (1).
INVESTIGATION AND INQUEST
(2) The coroner to whom an investigation is transferred shall proceed with the investigation in the same manner as if he or she had issued the warrant to take possession of the body. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 17 (2).

NOTIFICATION OF CHIEF CORONER
(3) The coroner who transfers an investigation to another coroner shall notify the Chief Coroner of the transfer, and the Chief Coroner shall assist in the transfer upon request. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 17 (3).

TRANSMITTING RESULTS OF FIRST INVESTIGATION
(4) The coroner who transfers an investigation to another coroner shall transmit to that other coroner the report of the post mortem examination of the body, if any, and his or her signed statement setting forth briefly the result of his or her investigation and any evidence to prove the fact of death and the identity of the body. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 17 (4).

INQUEST UNNECESSARY
18. (1) Where the coroner determines that an inquest is unnecessary, the coroner shall forthwith transmit to the Chief Coroner a signed statement setting forth briefly the results of the investigation, and shall also forthwith transmit to the division registrar a notice of the death in the form prescribed by the Vital Statistics Act. 2009, c. 15, s. 10.

RECOMMENDATIONS
(2) The coroner may make recommendations to the Chief Coroner with respect to the prevention of deaths in circumstances similar to those of the death that was the subject of the coroner’s investigation. 2009, c. 15, s. 10.

DISCLOSURE TO THE PUBLIC
(3) The Chief Coroner shall bring the findings and recommendations of a coroner’s investigation, which may include personal information as defined in the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, to the attention of the public, or any segment of the public, if the Chief Coroner reasonably believes that it is necessary in the interests of public safety to do so. 2009, c. 15, s. 10.

RECORD OF INVESTIGATIONS
(4) Every coroner shall keep a record of the cases reported in which an inquest has been determined to be unnecessary, showing for each case the coroner’s findings of facts to determine the answers to the questions set out in subsection 31 (1), and such findings, including the relevant findings of the post mortem examination and of any other examinations or analyses of the body carried out, shall be available to the spouse, parents, children, brothers and sisters of the deceased and to his or her personal representative, upon request. 2009, c. 15, s. 10.

CORONER’S REPORT IF DEATH SUSPECTED NOT OF NATURAL CAUSES
18.1 If the coroner is of the opinion, based on his or her investigation, that the deceased person may not have died of natural causes, the coroner shall advise the regional coroner of that opinion and the regional coroner shall so advise the Crown Attorney. 2009, c. 15, s. 11.
DETERMINATION TO HOLD AN INQUEST

19. Where the coroner determines that an inquest is necessary, the coroner shall,

   (a) forthwith notify the Chief Coroner of that determination and give the Chief Coroner a brief summary of the results of the investigation and of the grounds upon which the coroner made that determination;
       and

   (b) hold an inquest. 2009, c. 15, s. 12.

WHAT CORONER SHALL CONSIDER AND HAVE REGARD TO

20. When making a determination whether an inquest is necessary or unnecessary, the coroner shall have regard to whether the holding of an inquest would serve the public interest and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, shall consider,

    (a) whether the matters described in clauses 31 (1) (a) to (e) are known;

    (b) the desirability of the public being fully informed of the circumstances of the death through an inquest; and

    (c) the likelihood that the jury on an inquest might make useful recommendations directed to the avoidance of death in similar circumstances. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 20.

WHERE BODY DESTROYED OR REMOVED FROM ONTARIO

21. Where a coroner has reason to believe that a death has occurred in circumstances that warrant the holding of an inquest but, owing to the destruction of the body in whole or in part or to the fact that the body is lying in a place from which it cannot be recovered, or that the body has been removed from Ontario, an inquest cannot be held except by virtue of this section, he or she shall report the facts to the Chief Coroner who may direct an inquest to be held touching the death, in which case an inquest shall be held by the coroner making the report or by such other coroner as the Chief Coroner directs, and the law relating to coroners and coroners’ inquests applies with such modifications as are necessary in consequence of the inquest being held otherwise than on or after a view of the body. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 21.

INQUEST MANDATORY

22.1 A coroner shall hold an inquest under this Act into the death of a child upon learning that the child died in the circumstances described in clauses 72.2 (a), (b) and (c) of the Child and Family Services Act.
    2006, c. 24, s. 2 (1).

CHIEF CORONER MAY DIRECT THAT BODY BE DISINTERRED

24. Despite anything in the Funeral, Burial and Cremation Services Act, 2002 or a regulation made under that Act, the Chief Coroner may, at any time where he or she considers it necessary for the purposes of an investigation or an inquest, direct that a body be disinterred under and subject to such conditions as the Chief Coroner considers proper. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 24; 2002, c. 33, s. 142; 2009, c. 15, s. 15.
DIRECTION BY CHIEF CORONER
25. (1) The Chief Coroner may direct any coroner in respect of any death to issue a warrant to take possession of the body, conduct an investigation or hold an inquest, or may direct any other coroner to do so or may intervene to act as coroner personally for any one or more of such purposes. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 25 (1).

INQUEST INTO MULTIPLE DEATHS
(2) Where two or more deaths appear to have occurred in the same event or from a common cause, the Chief Coroner may direct that one inquest be held into all of the deaths. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 25 (2).

DIRECTION TO REPLACE CORONER
(3) If the Chief Coroner is of the opinion that a coroner is unable to continue presiding over an inquest for any reason, the Chief Coroner may direct another coroner to continue the inquest. 1994, c. 27, s. 136 (3).

REQUEST BY RELATIVE FOR INQUEST
26. (1) Where the coroner determines that an inquest is unnecessary, the spouse, parent, child, brother, sister or personal representative of the deceased person may request the coroner in writing to hold an inquest, and the coroner shall give the person requesting the inquest an opportunity to state his or her reasons, either personally, by the person’s agent or in writing, and the coroner shall advise the person in writing within sixty days of the receipt of the request of the coroner’s final decision and where the decision is to not hold an inquest shall deliver the reasons therefor in writing. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 26 (1); 1999, c. 6, s. 15 (3); 2005, c. 5, s. 15 (4).

REVIEW OF REFUSAL
(2) Where the final decision of a coroner under subsection (1) is to not hold an inquest, the person making the request may, within twenty days after the receipt of the decision of the coroner, request the Chief Coroner to review the decision and the Chief Coroner shall review the decision of the coroner after giving the person requesting the inquest an opportunity to state his or her reasons either personally, by the person’s agent or in writing. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 26 (2).

DECISION FINAL
(3) The decision of the Chief Coroner is final. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 26 (3); 2009, c. 15, s. 16.

WHERE CRIMINAL OFFENCE CHARGED
27. (1) Where a person is charged with an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) arising out of a death, an inquest touching the death shall be held only upon the direction of the Chief Coroner and, when held, the person charged is not a compellable witness. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 27 (1); 2009, c. 15, s. 17 (1).

IDEM
(2) Where during an inquest a person is charged with an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) arising out of the death, the coroner shall discharge the jury and close the inquest, and shall then proceed as if he or she had determined that an inquest was unnecessary, but the Chief Coroner may direct that the inquest be reopened. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 27 (2); 2009, c. 15, s. 17 (2).
WHERE CHARGE OR APPEAL FINALLY DISPOSED OF
(3) Despite subsections (1) and (2), where a person is charged with an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) arising out of the death and the charge or any appeal from a conviction or an acquittal of the offence charged has been finally disposed of or the time for taking an appeal has expired, the coroner may hold an inquest and the person charged is a compellable witness at the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 27 (3); 2009, c. 15, s. 17 (3).

POST MORTEM EXAMINATION
28. (1) A coroner may at any time during an investigation issue a warrant for a pathologist to perform a post mortem examination of the body. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

OTHER EXAMINATIONS AND ANALYSES
(2) A coroner may at any time during an investigation conduct examinations and analyses that the coroner considers appropriate in the circumstances or direct any person, other than the pathologist to whom the warrant is issued, to conduct such examinations and analyses. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

PATHOLOGIST’S DUTY
(3) The pathologist to whom the warrant is issued shall perform the post mortem examination of the body. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

POWER TO EXAMINE BODY
(4) The pathologist to whom the warrant is issued or, if no warrant has been issued, a pathologist who has been notified of the death by a coroner or police officer and who reasonably believes that a coroner’s warrant will be issued to him or her under subsection (1) may,
(a) enter and inspect any place where the dead body is and examine the body; and
(b) enter and inspect any place from which the pathologist has reasonable grounds for believing the body was removed. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

NOTICE TO CORONER
(5) A pathologist who exercises a power under subsection (4) shall notify,
(a) the coroner who issued the warrant; or
(b) if no warrant has been issued, the coroner by whom the pathologist believes the warrant will be issued. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

OTHER EXAMINATIONS AND ANALYSES
(6) The pathologist who performs the post mortem examination may conduct or direct any person other than a coroner to conduct such other examinations and analyses as he or she considers appropriate in the circumstances. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

DIRECTION OF CHIEF FORENSIC PATHOLOGIST
(7) The Chief Forensic Pathologist may direct a pathologist or any other person, other than a coroner, to conduct any examinations and analyses that the Chief Forensic Pathologist considers appropriate in the circumstances. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.
ASSISTANCE
(8) The pathologist who performs the post mortem examination may obtain the assistance of any person or persons in performing the post mortem examination and in conducting any other examinations and analyses. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

PATHOLOGIST FROM REGISTER
(9) The coroner may issue a warrant under subsection (1) only to a pathologist whose name is on the pathologists register. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

ASSIGNMENT TO ANOTHER PATHOLOGIST
(10) The Chief Forensic Pathologist may at any time during an investigation assign another pathologist whose name is on the pathologists register to perform the post mortem examination in place of the pathologist named on the coroner’s warrant, and in that case, every reference in this section to the pathologist to whom the warrant is issued applies to the pathologist assigned to the investigation by the Chief Forensic Pathologist. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

REPORTS OF POST MORTEM FINDINGS
29. (1) The pathologist who performed the post mortem examination of a body under section 28 shall forthwith report in writing his or her findings from the post mortem examination and from any other examinations or analyses that he or she conducted to the coroner who issued the warrant, the regional coroner and, if the pathologist who performed the post mortem examination is not the Chief Forensic Pathologist, the Chief Forensic Pathologist. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

SAME
(2) A person, other than the pathologist who performed the post mortem examination, who conducted any other examination or analysis under section 28 shall forthwith report his or her findings in writing to the pathologist who performed the post mortem examination, the coroner who issued the warrant, the regional coroner and, if the pathologist who performed the post mortem examination is not the Chief Forensic Pathologist, the Chief Forensic Pathologist. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

FURTHER POST MORTEMS
(3) If, after a post mortem examination of a body is performed, the Chief Forensic Pathologist is of the opinion that a second or further post mortem examination of the body is necessary, he or she shall so advise the Chief Coroner, and the Chief Coroner shall issue a warrant for a second or further post mortem examination of the body. 2009, c. 15, s. 18.

CROWN COUNSEL
30. (1) Every coroner before holding an inquest shall notify the Crown Attorney of the time and place at which it is to be held and the Crown Attorney or a barrister and solicitor or any other person designated by him or her shall attend the inquest and shall act as counsel to the coroner at the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 30 (1).

COUNSEL FOR MINISTER
(2) The Minister may be represented at an inquest by counsel and shall be deemed to be a person with standing at the inquest for the purpose. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 30 (2).
PURPOSES OF INQUEST

31. (1) Where an inquest is held, it shall inquire into the circumstances of the death and determine,

(a) who the deceased was;

(b) how the deceased came to his or her death;

(c) when the deceased came to his or her death;

(d) where the deceased came to his or her death; and

(e) by what means the deceased came to his or her death. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 31 (1).

IDEM

(2) The jury shall not make any finding of legal responsibility or express any conclusion of law on any matter referred to in subsection (1). R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 31 (2).

AUTHORITY OF JURY TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS

(3) Subject to subsection (2), the jury may make recommendations directed to the avoidance of death in similar circumstances or respecting any other matter arising out of the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 31 (3).

IMPROPER FINDING

(4) A finding that contravenes subsection (2) is improper and shall not be received. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 31 (4).

FAILURE TO MAKE PROPER FINDING

(5) Where a jury fails to deliver a proper finding it shall be discharged. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 31 (5).

INQUEST PUBLIC

32. An inquest shall be open to the public except where the coroner is of the opinion that national security might be endangered or where a person is charged with an indictable offence under the Criminal Code (Canada) in which cases the coroner may hold the hearing concerning any such matters in the absence of the public. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 32.

JURIES

33. (1) Every inquest shall be held with a jury composed of five persons. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 33 (1); 2009, c. 15, s. 19 (1).

JURORS

(2) The coroner shall direct a constable to select from the list of names of persons provided under subsection 34 (2) five persons who in his or her opinion are suitable to serve as jurors at an inquest and the constable shall summon them to attend the inquest at the time and place appointed. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 33 (2).

IDEM

(3) Where fewer than five of the jurors so summoned attend at the inquest, the coroner may name and appoint so many persons then present or who can be found as will make up a jury of five. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 33 (3).

(4) Repealed: 2009, c. 15, s. 19 (2).
LIST OF JURORS
34. (1) A coroner may by his or her warrant require the sheriff for the area in which an inquest is to be held to provide a list of the names of such number of persons as the coroner specifies in the warrant taken from the jury roll prepared under the Juries Act. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (1).

IDEM
(2) Upon receipt of the warrant, the sheriff shall provide the list containing names of persons in the number specified by the coroner, taken from the jury roll prepared under the Juries Act, together with their ages, places of residence and occupations. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (2).

ELIGIBILITY
(3) No person who is ineligible to serve as a juror under the Juries Act shall be summoned to serve or shall serve as a juror at an inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (3).

IDEM
(4) An officer, employee or inmate of a hospital or an institution referred to in subsection 10 (2) or (3) shall not serve as a juror at an inquest upon the death of a person who died therein. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (4).

EXCUSING FROM SERVICE
(5) The coroner may excuse any person on the list from being summoned or from serving as a juror on the grounds of illness or hardship. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (5).

EXCLUSION OF JUROR WITH INTEREST
(6) The coroner presiding at an inquest may exclude a person from being sworn as a juror where the coroner believes there is a likelihood that the person, because of interest or bias, would be unable to render a verdict in accordance with the evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (6).

EXCUSING OF JUROR FOR ILLNESS
(7) Where in the course of an inquest the coroner is satisfied that a juror should not, because of illness or other reasonable cause, continue to act, the coroner may discharge the juror. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (7).

CONTINUATION WITH REDUCED JURY
(8) Where in the course of an inquest a member of the jury dies or becomes incapacitated from any cause or is excluded or discharged by the coroner under subsection (6) or (7) or is found to be ineligible to serve, the jury shall, unless the coroner otherwise directs and if the number of jurors is not reduced below three, be deemed to remain properly constituted for all purposes of the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 34 (8).

REPORT TO SHERIFF RE JURY SERVICE
35. On or before the 31st day of December in each year, the coroner shall advise the sheriff of the names of persons who have received fees for service as jurors at inquests and the number of each such name on the jury roll. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 35.

JURY IRREGULARITIES NOT TO AFFECT OUTCOME
36. The omission to observe any of the provisions of this Act or the regulations respecting the eligibility and selection of jurors is not a ground for impeaching or quashing a verdict. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 36.
JURY'S DUTIES, POWERS

VIEW OF PLACE

37. (1) The jury shall view any place that the coroner directs them to view. 2009, c. 15, s. 20.

QUESTIONS

(2) The jurors are entitled to ask relevant questions of each witness. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 37 (2).

MAJORITY VERDICT

38. A verdict or finding may be returned by a majority of the jurors sworn. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 38.

SERVICE OF SUMMONSES

39. A summons to a juror or to a witness may be served,

(a) by personal service;

(b) by leaving a copy, in a sealed envelope addressed to the person summoned, at his or her place of residence with anyone who appears to be an adult member of the same household; or

(c) by sending it by registered mail addressed to the place of residence of the person summoned. 2009, c. 15, s. 21.

SUMMONSES

40. (1) A coroner may require any person by summons,

(a) to give evidence on oath or affirmation at an inquest; and

(b) to produce in evidence at an inquest documents and things specified by the coroner, relevant to the subject-matter of the inquest and admissible. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 40 (1).

FORM AND SERVICE OF SUMMONSES

(2) A summons issued under subsection (1) shall be in the form approved by the Minister and shall be signed by the coroner. 2009, c. 15, s. 22.

BENCH WARRANTS

(3) Upon proof to the satisfaction of a judge of the Superior Court of Justice of the service of a summons under this section upon a person and that,

(a) such person has failed to attend or to remain in attendance at an inquest in accordance with the requirements of the summons; and

(b) the person's presence is material to the inquest, the judge may, by a warrant in the prescribed form, directed to any police officer, cause such witness to be apprehended anywhere within Ontario and forthwith to be brought to the inquest and to be detained in custody as the judge may order until the person's presence as a witness at the inquest is no longer required, or, in the discretion of the judge, to be released on a recognizance (with or without sureties) conditioned for appearance to give evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 40 (3); 1997, c. 39, s. 4 (2); 2006, c. 19, Sched. C, s. 1 (1); 2009, c. 33, Sched. 9, s. 3 (1).

PROOF OF SERVICE
(4) Service of a summons may be proved by affidavit in an application under subsection (3). R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 40 (4).

CERTIFICATE OF FACTS
(5) Where an application under subsection (3) is made on behalf of a coroner, the coroner may certify to the judge the facts relied on to establish that the presence of the person summoned is material for the purposes of the inquest and such certificate may be accepted by the judge as proof of such facts. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 40 (5).

PERSONS WITH STANDING AT INQUEST
41. (1) On the application of any person before or during an inquest, the coroner shall designate the person as a person with standing at the inquest if the coroner finds that the person is substantially and directly interested in the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 41 (1); 1993, c. 27, Sched.; 1999, c. 12, Sched. P. s. 2.

RIGHTS OF PERSONS WITH STANDING AT INQUEST
(2) A person designated as a person with standing at an inquest may,
   (a) be represented by a person authorized under the Law Society Act to represent the person with standing;
   (b) call and examine witnesses and present arguments and submissions;
   (c) conduct cross-examinations of witnesses at the inquest relevant to the interest of the person with standing and admissible. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 41 (2); 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 104 (1).

COSTS OF REPRESENTATION
(3) If the coroner in an inquest into the death of a victim as defined in the Victims’ Bill of Rights, 1995 designates a spouse, same-sex partner or parent of the victim as a person with standing at the inquest, the person may apply to the Minister to have the costs that the person incurs for representation by legal counsel in connection with the inquest paid out of the victims’ justice fund account continued under subsection 5 (1) of the Victims’ Bill of Rights, 1995. 2006, c. 24, s. 2 (2).

PAYMENT
(4) Subject to the approval of Management Board of Cabinet, payment of the costs described in subsection (3) may be made out of the victims’ justice fund account. 2006, c. 24, s. 2 (2).

PROTECTION FOR WITNESSES
42. (1) A witness at an inquest shall be deemed to have objected to answer any question asked the witness upon the ground that his or her answer may tend to criminate the witness or may tend to establish his or her liability to civil proceedings at the instance of the Crown, or of any person, and no answer given by a witness at an inquest shall be used or be receivable in evidence against the witness in any trial or other proceedings against him or her thereafter taking place, other than a prosecution for perjury in giving such evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 42 (1).

RIGHT TO OBJECT UNDER CANADA EVIDENCE ACT
(2) Where it appears at any stage of the inquest that the evidence that a witness is about to give would tend to criminate the witness, it is the duty of the coroner and of the Crown Attorney to ensure that the witness is informed of his or her rights under section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 42 (2).
RIGHTS OF WITNESSES TO REPRESENTATION

43. (1) A witness at an inquest is entitled to be advised as to his or her rights by a person authorized under the Law Society Act to advise him or her, but such person may take no other part in the inquest without leave of the coroner. 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 104 (2).

SAME

(2) Where an inquest is held in the absence of the public, a person advising a witness under subsection (1) is not entitled to be present except when that witness is giving evidence. 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 104 (2).

ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

WHAT IS ADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE AT INQUEST

44. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), a coroner may admit as evidence at an inquest, whether or not admissible as evidence in a court,

(a) any oral testimony; and

(b) any document or other thing, relevant to the purposes of the inquest and may act on such evidence, but the coroner may exclude anything unduly repetitious or anything that the coroner considers does not meet such standards of proof as are commonly relied on by reasonably prudent persons in the conduct of their own affairs and the coroner may comment on the weight that ought to be given to any particular evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 44 (1).

WHAT IS INADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE AT INQUEST

(2) Nothing is admissible in evidence at an inquest,

(a) that would be inadmissible in a court by reason of any privilege under the law of evidence; or

(b) that is inadmissible by the statute under which the proceedings arise or any other statute. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 44 (2).

CONFLICTS

(3) Nothing in subsection (1) overrides the provisions of any Act expressly limiting the extent to or purposes for which any oral testimony, documents or things may be admitted or used in evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 44 (3).

COPIES

(4) Where the coroner is satisfied as to their authenticity, a copy of a document or other thing may be admitted as evidence at an inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 44 (4).

PHOTOCOPIES

(5) Where a document has been filed in evidence at an inquest, the coroner may, or the person producing it or entitled to it may with the leave of the coroner, cause the document to be photocopied and the coroner may authorize the photocopy to be filed in evidence in the place of the document filed and release the document filed, or may furnish to the person producing it or the person entitled to it a photocopy of the document filed certified by the coroner. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 44 (5).
TAKING EVIDENCE
45. (1) The evidence upon an inquest or any part of it shall be recorded by a person appointed by the coroner and approved by the Crown Attorney and who before acting shall make oath or affirmation that he or she will truly and faithfully record the evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 45 (1).

TRANSCRIPTION OF EVIDENCE
(2) It is not necessary to transcribe the evidence unless the Chief Coroner or Crown Attorney orders it to be done or unless any other person requests a copy of the transcript and pays the fees therefor except that the coroner may prohibit the transcribing of all or any part of evidence taken in the absence of the public. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 45 (2); 2009, c. 15, s. 23.

ADJOURNMENTS
46. An inquest may be adjourned from time to time by the coroner of his or her own motion or where it is shown to the satisfaction of the coroner that the adjournment is required to permit an adequate hearing to be held. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 46.

MAINTENANCE OF ORDER AT INQUEST
47. A coroner may make such orders or give such directions at an inquest as he or she considers necessary for the maintenance of order at the inquest, and, if any person disobeys or fails to comply with any such order or direction, the coroner may call for the assistance of any peace officer to enforce the order or direction, and every peace officer so called upon shall take such action as is necessary to enforce the order or direction and may use such force as is reasonably required for that purpose. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 47.

INTERPRETERS AND CONSTABLES INTERPRETERS
48. (1) A coroner may, and if required by the Crown Attorney or requested by the witness shall, employ a person to act as interpreter for a witness at an inquest, and such person may be summoned to attend the inquest and before acting shall make oath or affirm that he or she will truly and faithfully translate the evidence. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 48 (1).

CONSTABLES
(2) A coroner may appoint such persons as constables as the coroner considers necessary for the purpose of assisting the coroner in an inquest and, on the request of the coroner, the police force having jurisdiction in the locality in which an inquest is held shall provide a police officer for the purpose and, before acting, every such constable shall take oath or affirm that he or she will faithfully perform his or her duties. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 48 (2).

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS
49. The coroner conducting an inquest has power to administer oaths and affirmations for the purpose of the inquest. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 49.

FURTHER POWERS OF CORONER ABUSE OF PROCESSES
50. (1) A coroner may make such orders or give such directions at an inquest as the coroner considers proper to prevent abuse of its processes. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 50 (1).
LIMITATION ON CROSS-EXAMINATION

(2) A coroner may reasonably limit further cross-examination of a witness where the coroner is satisfied that the cross-examination of the witness has been sufficient to disclose fully and fairly the facts in relation to which the witness has given evidence or where the coroner is of the opinion that the questions being asked are irrelevant, unduly repetitious or abusive. 2009, c. 15, s. 24.

EXCLUSION OF REPRESENTATIVES

(3) A coroner may exclude from a hearing anyone, other than a person licensed under the Law Society Act, advising a witness if the coroner finds that such person is not competent properly to advise the witness, or does not understand and comply at the inquest with the duties and responsibilities of an adviser. 2006, c. 21, Sched. C, s. 104 (3).

RULES OF PROCEDURE FOR INQUESTS

50.1 The Chief Coroner may make additional rules of procedure for inquests. 2009, c. 15, s. 25.

CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS

51. Where any person without lawful excuse,

(a) on being duly summoned as a witness or a juror at an inquest makes default in attending at the inquest; or

(b) being in attendance as a witness at an inquest, refuses to take an oath or to make an affirmation legally required by the coroner to be taken or made, or to produce any document or thing in his or her power or control legally required by the coroner to be produced by the person or to answer any question to which the coroner may legally require an answer; or

(c) does any other thing that would, if the inquest had been a court of law having power to commit for contempt, have been contempt of that court, the coroner may state a case to the Divisional Court setting out the facts and that court may, on application on behalf of and in the name of the coroner, inquire into the matter and, after hearing any witnesses who may be produced against or on behalf of that person and after hearing any statement that may be offered in defence, punish or take steps for the punishment of that person in like manner as if he or she had been guilty of contempt of the court. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 51.

CONCLUSION OF INQUEST

RETURN OF VERDICT

52. (1) The coroner shall forthwith after an inquest return the verdict or finding, with the evidence where the Crown Attorney or Chief Coroner has ordered it to be transcribed, to the Chief Coroner, and shall transmit a copy of the verdict and recommendations to the Crown Attorney. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 52 (1); 2009, c. 15, s. 26.

RELEASE OF EXHIBITS

(2) After an inquest is concluded, the coroner shall, upon request, release documents and things put in evidence at the inquest to the lawful owner or person entitled to possession thereof. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 52 (2).
PROTECTION FROM PERSONAL LIABILITY

53. No action or other proceeding shall be instituted against any person exercising a power or performing a duty under this Act for any act done in good faith in the execution or intended execution of any such power or duty or for any alleged neglect or default in the execution in good faith of any such power or duty. 2009, c. 15, s. 27.

SEALS NOT NECESSARY

54. In proceedings under this Act, it is not necessary for a person to affix a seal to a document, and no document is invalidated by reason of the lack of a seal, even though the document purports to be sealed. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 54.

OFFENCES

55. Any person who contravenes section 10, 11, 13 or subsection 16 (6) is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than six months, or to both. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.37, s. 55.

REGULATIONS AND FEES

56. (1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations,
   (a) prescribing powers and duties of the Chief Coroner;
   (b) prescribing powers and duties of the Chief Forensic Pathologist;
   (c) prescribing the composition of the Oversight Council and of the complaints committee of the Oversight Council;
   (d) prescribing matters for the purpose of paragraph 7 of subsection 8.1 (1);
   (e) respecting the making, referral and reviewing of complaints under section 8.4;
   (f) defining “restrain” for the purpose of subsections 10 (4.7) and (4.8);
   (g) governing the retention, storage and disposal of tissue samples, implanted devices and body fluids obtained in performing a post mortem examination of a body or conducting examinations or analyses under section 28. 2009, c. 15, s. 28 (1); 2009, c. 33, Sched. 9, s. 3 (2).

SAME

(2) The Minister may make regulations,
   (a) respecting the appointment of persons under section 16.1;
   (b) prescribing limits on the powers of persons appointed under section 16.1;
   (c) providing for the selecting, recording, summoning, attendance and service of persons as jurors at inquests;
   (d) prescribing matters that may be grounds for disqualification because of interest or bias of jurors for the purposes of subsection 34 (6);
   (e) prescribing the contents of oaths and affirmations required or authorized by this Act;
   (f) prescribing the form of a warrant for the purpose of subsection 40 (3);
(g) prescribing fees and allowances that shall be paid to persons rendering services in connection with coroners’ investigations and inquests and providing for the adjustment of such fees and allowances in special circumstances;

(h) requiring and governing the disclosure, collection and use of information, including personal information within the meaning of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, about coroners, pathologists and other members of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario among the Chief Coroner, the Chief Forensic Pathologist, the Oversight Council and the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario. 2009, c. 15, s. 28 (1).

RE: Independent Review of First Nations Representation on Ontario’s Jury Roll

I would like to take this opportunity to introduce myself as the Independent Reviewer appointed by the Attorney General and the Government of Ontario to examine, report and offer recommendations regarding the process for inclusion of First Nation peoples living in reserve communities on the provincial jury roll from which potential jurors are selected for all jury trials and coroners inquests. My report will be submitted to the Attorney General of Ontario on or before August 31, 2012.

The matter of First Nations’ representation on Ontario’s jury roll has been raised in certain trials and coroners’ inquests over the last several years, a development that has prompted some First Nations’ organizations to advocate for a systemic review of the creation of the jury roll. The Government of Ontario has responded by establishing a process for an Independent Review with the objective of enhancing First Nations’ representation on the provincial jury roll and strengthening the relationship between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations in this regard.

I am keen to meet with First Nation organizations and communities in the next few months to discuss this important matter and obtain an informed view of the issues related to First Nations and the jury roll. I hope you will be interested in participating in this process. I welcome your involvement, or the involvement of your member communities, and look forward to discussing the most effective means by which this could occur, considering the needs of your organization and the parameters of this process. We would be pleased to receive written submissions, convene or attend meetings, or engage in a combination of these approaches.

Throughout the Independent Review process, I will be supported by a legal team led by John Terry, a partner at Torys LLP and Candice S. Metallic, of Maurice Law Barristers & Solicitors as Associate Counsel. Please feel encouraged to follow up with either Mr. Terry or Ms. Metallic if you wish to participate in this process, or if you have any questions, comments or concerns respecting the process.

For further information, please visit the website for the Independent Review at www.firstnationsandjuriesreview.ca. I look forward to meeting with you in the very near future.

Sincerely,

Frank Iacobucci

Points Raised Through Dialogue with First Nations and Further Questions

Last November, I wrote to you to introduce myself as the Independent Reviewer appointed by the Attorney General and the Government of Ontario to examine, report and offer recommendations regarding the process for inclusion of First Nation peoples living in reserve communities on the provincial jury roll from which potential jurors are selected for all jury trials and coroners inquests.

I explained at the time that I would be meeting with First Nation organizations and communities over the next several months to obtain an informed view of the issues related to First Nations and the jury roll. I have now completed most of those consultations, having traveled throughout the province to meet with First Nations leaders and community members, treaty organization representatives, judges, court officials and other interested groups to discuss this very serious issue.

As we move from the consultation phase toward the report-writing stage of my review, I wanted to give you feedback on what I have heard during these consultations and provide you with an additional opportunity to give your input on some follow-up questions that I have. In order to do that, I enclose a short document that describes the points raised through my dialogue with First Nations, organized under five issues, as well as a list of follow-up questions relating to some of those issues.

I encourage you to provide me with your comments or submissions in response to these questions, any of the other issues discussed and points raised in the document, or any other issues relevant to my review. In order to meet the deadline for me to complete my report, I would be grateful if you would provide me with any comments or submissions by no later than May 25, 2012.

Sincerely,

Frank Iacobucci
INDEPENDENT REVIEW OF FIRST NATION REPRESENTATION ON ONTARIO’S JURY ROLL

MANDATE OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW

I. Systemic challenges to First Nations representation on Ontario’s jury roll for trials and coroner’s inquests

II. Improve relationship between First Nations and Ministry of the Attorney General in the context of the jury roll

POINTS RAISED THROUGH DIALOGUE WITH FIRST NATIONS

ISSUE #1: FIRST NATIONS’ PERSPECTIVES ON THE JUSTICE SYSTEM

CHILL THE DESIRE TO SERVE ON ONTARIO JURIES

a) Competing values, ideologies and laws with respect to achieving justice, i.e. Canadian system of criminal justice does not accord with traditional First Nations principles of attaining harmony and balance

b) Systemic discrimination – negative experiences have shaped adverse perspectives and mistrust of the whole of the criminal justice system, including jury duty

c) Justice challenges in northern First Nations communities are distinct -- e.g. lack of access -- and compound the problem

d) Lack of education about and awareness of the jury system

e) Self-government objectives for community based justice initiatives and ancillary resource/capacity requirements are not supported

f) Inadequate policing services and funding contribute to negative perceptions of the criminal justice system

ISSUE #2: CURRENT PRACTICES FOR COLLECTION OF NAMES AND CONTACT INFORMATION OF FIRST NATIONS PEOPLES ON RESERVE ARE INADEQUATE

a) Residency vs. membership – A specific list of on-reserve residence is required, rather than the full membership list or voters list

b) First Nations seek capacity to gather and maintain appropriate, accurate and current records, including addresses, for jury roll purposes

c) Voluntariness of First Nation participation is required given extent of existing social and economic pressures. First Nations’ administrators are best positioned to solicit interest

ISSUE #3: JUROR QUESTIONNAIRES POSE PROBLEMS AND CONCERNS THAT DETER FIRST NATION RESPONSES

a) Penalty for non-response (fine or imprisonment) within unreasonable time limit (five days of receipt of notice) is perceived as imposing jury duty through intimidation and threat

b) The requirement to declare ‘Canadian’ citizenship prevents participation of many First Nations peoples

c) List of exemptions from jury duty ought to include elected First Nation leadership
d) English or French-speaking requirement is problematic for many whose primary language is their First Nation language – juries ought to be equipped with translation services, if necessary

e) Lack of translation of questionnaires and instructions pose challenges to completing forms

f) Lack of understanding of the jury selection process and role of juries prevent response to jury questionnaires

g) Confusion and misunderstanding may arise when someone is empanelled but not chosen for a jury

ISSUE #4: PRACTICAL BARRIERS TO JURY PARTICIPATION

a) Transportation – travel to urban centers often requires multiple modes of transportation that occupy significant amounts of time (several days in some circumstances) and costs are beyond what people can afford out of pocket. Transportation presents a significant barrier to northern First Nations who incur higher travel costs which, in turn, further inhibits participation

b) Accommodations and meal allowances are not always sufficient

c) Childcare expenses must be included as a necessary expense

d) Employment income supplements may be required, when necessary

e) All expenses related to the jury system must be paid prior to travel due to lack of resources and credit

f) Community-based supports, such as assistance with process and postjury service psychological effects, are needed by those who participate in juries

g) Lack of translation services while in urban centres creates hardships

h) Criminal records and lack of awareness of pardon procedures present a bar to service

ISSUE #5: RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE MINISTRY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND FIRST NATIONS WITH RESPECT TO THE JURY ROLL NEEDS TO BE IMPROVED

a) Need for collaboration between the Ministry of the Attorney General and First Nations

b) Education and awareness of jury system for both trials and coroner’s inquests among First Nations needs to be improved

c) Increased education required for provincial officials regarding First Nations’ culture, values and traditions

d) More education about process for pardons and access to support services for First Nations is required

e) Proper funding is required to support community based justice initiatives aimed at enhancing participation on juries in a culturally appropriate manner and to implement First Nation restorative justice initiatives

f) Better cultural sensitivity training is needed for those involved in the justice system
FOLLOW-UP QUESTIONS

1. ON-RESERVE RESIDENCY NAME AND ADDRESS INFORMATION
   a) How should this information be collected?
   b) Should OHIP information be used?
   c) Should band list information be provided?
   d) Should First Nations communities collect this information themselves and provide it to the Ministry of the Attorney General?

2. JURY FORMS
   a) Should the forms ask whether an individual is “First Nations” as opposed to the current form which asks whether an individual is a Canadian citizen?
   b) How can First Nations members be encouraged to complete and submit the forms? For example, should the penalties for non-response be modified in some way?
   c) Are there any exemptions from jury service that should be included in addition to exempted First Nations leadership?
   d) If the form stated that a translator could be provided for a juror, would that improve First Nations participation?

3. PRACTICAL BARRIERS
   a) What kinds of transportation, accommodation, meals or other costs should be paid for in order to encourage participation?
   b) What kinds of community supports for completing jury forms, attending a trial or inquest, or dealing with post-jury psychological effects should be provided?

4. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN FIRST NATIONS AND MINISTRY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
   a) What steps would you recommend be taken to improve this relationship?

Introduction

This is the second of two background papers prepared for participants of the Access to Justice Symposium hosted by the Law Society of Upper Canada on October 29, 2013. It briefly sets out themes observed from reviewing selected Ontario and national reports on access to justice issues from the past several years. The themes are illustrated with quotations, primarily from the reports listed on the following page.

This paper does not attempt to summarize or synthesize the extensive content and recommendations contained in these reports. Nor does it draw on the many articles, books, additional reports, conferences, and symposia on access to justice issues. The themes and quotations have been put forward as “food for thought” to generate ideas, discussion and dialogue at the Symposium.

Importance of Access to Justice and the Need for Change

Theme #1: Access to justice is an issue of fundamental importance.
An explicit and underlying theme is the vital importance of ensuring that members of the public have access to justice, both in terms of process and substantive outcomes.

- Most people agree that access to justice is a fundamental right in a democratic society.
  – Listening to Ontarians, p.2

- The most advanced justice system in the world is a failure if it does not provide justice to the people it is meant to serve. Access to justice is therefore critical.

Theme #2: There is an urgent need for significant change.
Despite the innovations and progress achieved by governments, legal organizations, community groups, and multi-stakeholder partnerships, the need for systemic change remains. The reports examined for this paper describe issues that require urgent attention, systems that are unsustainable in many respects, and the need for fundamental transformation as opposed to more modest reform.

- [There is a] broad consensus on the need for significant change to improve access to justice, and an evolving consensus on the central directions for reform.... The civil justice system is too badly broken for a quick fix.
  – Equal Justice, pp.1 and 13

- We must make changes urgently....The current system is unsustainable. ..... Change is urgently needed.... Now it is time to act.
  – NAC: Roadmap, pp. v, 5, 24

- As long as justice has existed, there have been those who struggled to access it. But as Canadians celebrated the new millennium, it became clear that we were increasingly failing in our responsibility to provide a justice system that was accessible, responsive and citizen-focused. Reports told us that cost, delays, long trials, complex procedures and other barriers were making it impossible for more and more Canadians to exercise their legal rights.

- [T]he justice system, as it relates to First Nations peoples, and particularly in Northern Ontario, is in crisis.”

There is today an overwhelming consensus that if the justice system as we know it is to survive, it must undergo significant change to provide greater access to justice for the public.

Theme #3: There is no common definition but a common understanding is emerging.

There is no common definition of “access to justice” and the emphasis of what it comprises has evolved over time. However, a review of recent reports indicates a commonality of thinking on the concept, especially for civil and family law. For example, there is recognition that access to justice extends beyond access to lawyers and courts; that it requires a range of ways to prevent and resolve everyday legal problems; and that it includes fair processes and just outcomes.

[Access to justice] can perhaps be thought of as encompassing a hierarchy of approaches:
1) Helping the largest number of people to use the system as it is (by such means as legal aid);
2) Changing the justice system to make it more responsive and more user-friendly;
3) Helping people to find other ways to avoid or resolve problems such that they do not require access to the justice system.

[Access to justice refers broadly to the access that citizens have to dispute resolution tools of justice including but not limited to courts. Effective access to justice does not only refer to reductions in costs, access to lawyers and access to courts; but rather, it is a broad term that refers more generally to the efficaciousness of a justice system in meeting the dispute resolution needs of its citizens.]

– Canadian Forum of Civil Justice website

[We believe that an accessible family justice system must be affordable and easy to navigate but we also believe that ensuring access to justice in the area of family law requires attention to other factors which create barriers...]

– LCO: Family Justice, p.16

Our central animating principle must be envisioning a truly equal justice system, one that provides meaningful and effective access to all, taking into account the diverse lives that people live.

– Equal Justice, p.2

Providing justice – not just in the form of fair and just process but also in the form of fair and just outcomes – must be our primary concern.

– NAC: Roadmap, p.9
In general terms, members of our society would have appropriate access to civil and family justice if they had the knowledge, resources and services to deal effectively with civil and family legal matters.

– Hon. Justice Thomas Cromwell of the Supreme Court of Canada, cited in NAC: Roadmap, p.27

The NAC’s “Roadmap” report succinctly summarizes problems identified with the civil and family justice system: too complex, too slow, too expensive, and often incapable of producing just outcomes (NAC: Roadmap, p.1). One approach to defining access to justice would be to state this in the positive:

Access to justice exists when the public can understand, use and afford information and services to prevent and resolve their legal disputes and to achieve just outcomes without delay.

New Directions – Cultural Shift

Theme #4: We need to put the public first
There is a strong sense that justice system structures, processes and reforms have too often been designed to serve the needs of legal professionals and service providers. This has created barriers for members of the public in addressing their legal issues and asserting their legal rights. Some reports articulate the need for a major cultural shift within the justice system to focus more on the needs of the public in general and on vulnerable groups in particular.

An inclusive justice system...focuses on people’s needs, not those of justice system professionals and institutions .... Getting to equal justice demands that we first focus on the people who are most disadvantaged by their social and economic situation.

– Equal Justice, pp.14 and 16

The justice system, through those that work in it, must shift its focus fundamentally and see itself through a more user-centred, rather than provider-centered, lens of service.

– SRL White Paper, p.5

Any people continue to face significant barriers to accessing legal information, including language, literacy, disability, distance, and skill level or confidence.

– Public Legal Education, p.30

The focus must be on the people who need to use the system. This focus must include all people, especially members of immigrant, aboriginal and rural populations and other vulnerable groups.

– NAC: Roadmap, p.7
These systemic issues include...the almost universally-held view of First Nations individuals that the justice system is alien or foreign [and] the problem of inadequate legal representation of First Nations individuals, particularly in the north, resulting in virtually automatic guilty pleas.

– First Nations/Juries, p.87

[Persons with disabilities... are more likely to identify a civil legal problem they encounter as being very disruptive in their lives.

– Listening, p.12

[Accessing justice in French in Ontario can be more difficult, time consuming and expensive than accessing justice in English....In spite of the goodwill on the part of participants in the justice system, the French-speaking community continues to experience barriers to accessing justice in French.

– Access in French, pp.7 and 48

Theme #5: We need to do more at the front end and on prevention.

Many reports stress the importance of prevention strategies and the need for integrated, front-end services. Early information and access to a range of assistance and tools can help to prevent legal issues from escalating and leading to other problems in an individual's life.

[W]e should not lose sight of the value of prevention as a means of avoiding civil legal needs altogether.

– Listening, p.56

Perhaps the most pressing access innovation is to develop effective triage and referral systems in each jurisdiction.

– Equal Justice, p.20

We have adopted an underlying premise that early intervention in family law disputes can minimize the likelihood of an unnecessary protracted dispute before the court and result in better outcomes for families.

– LCO: Family Justice, p.57

The justice system must acknowledge this reality by widening its focus from its current (and expensive) court-based “emergency room” orientation to include education and dispute prevention.

– NAC: Roadmap, p.11
…[T]he “front end” of the justice system…precedes – and often obviates the need for – formal representation in the court system.
– NAC: Prevention, Triage, Referral, p.i

As with medicine where there is now a greater emphasis on prevention and health promotion, there is already a demand in certain sectors for more preventative lawyering to avoid disputes in the first place and reduce legal costs over the longer term.
– Legal Futures, p.21

A triage role should be identified for frontline staff who help diagnose the specific needs of particular SRLs and then assist those people to obtain the required information or services....
– SRL White Paper, p.42

[C]ase management initiated early on in a matter may promote the earlier resolution of the dispute.
– NAC: Court Processes, p.9

Theme #6: We need more integrated and holistic responses

The reports recognize the inter-connectedness of legal problems and various health, social and financial problems that individuals face. This calls for more integrated and holistic approaches to serve people with legal issues. Some suggest greater collaboration among legal service providers and other disciplines, for example by working with social workers and others in multidisciplinary teams.

The initial problem may be a legal problem, but without early intervention this problem may trigger subsequent problems, legal or otherwise, such as greater demands on other social welfare programs, social housing programs, physical or mental health programs, etc. Early intervention...calls for a more holistic or integrated institutional response....
– Legal Aid Review, p.vi

[A culture shift is required to] move away from the adversarial model and a reorientation to problem-solving in a multi-professional context.
– Self-Represented Litigants, p.128

[Services can be provided] through teams of lawyers, other legal service providers (like paralegals) and providers of related services (like social workers). Teams can deliver more comprehensive and holistic services tailored to people’s needs. ... Target: By 2030, 80% of lawyers in people-centred law practices work with an integrated team of service providers.
– Equal Justice, pp.27 and 28
Viable solutions require collaboration to create synergy and to respond to people’s needs in a holistic way.
– Connecting, p.5

With some (important) exceptions, our system presumes homogeneity on the part of users... and for the most part, it divorces the legal problem from the other issues that attend relationship breakdown.
– LCO: Family Justice, p.53

Issues to Address

Collectively, the reports examined for this paper press for change in many areas and for various population groups. This section selects three areas that multiple reports indicate as priorities. However, this should not be taken to indicate that these three areas are necessarily the most important issues to be addressed. Other issues may be viewed as equally or more urgent.

Theme #7: The family law system requires urgent attention.

Despite many improvements in the family justice system, many reports call for further and more dramatic changes, including a greater emphasis on non-adversarial approaches and early intervention.

[F]amily relationship breakdown is the primary reason why most Ontarians enter the civil justice system.
– Listening, p.57

Major change is urgently needed in the family justice system.
– NAC: Roadmap, p.17

Canadians do not have adequate access to family justice.... Without access to the mechanisms to implement them, the substantive rules have limited value.
– NAC: Family Justice, p.1 Exec Summary

The problem [of unrepresented litigants] is particularly pronounced in family law matters.
– Equal Justice, p.9

Over the past few years, there has been considerable study and reform of the family law system. Yet problems of complexity and difficulties for unrepresented litigants in particular remain.
Extending paralegals’ scope of practice to include family law is controversial; however we conclude that this possibility should not simply be dismissed.

Respondents frequently questioned the limitations placed on the provision of assistance by paralegals, especially in relation to family matters.

– National SRL, p.13

We must concentrate our efforts on the specific areas of law with the greatest societal need and where we can have the highest impact. It is for this reason that I continue to advocate for ongoing family law reform.

Theme #8: Self-represented parties are not going away

Many reports raise the need for justice system changes in light of high numbers of self-represented persons, whether in civil, family or criminal cases. The phenomenon of self-represented persons is not expected to go away.

There is an urgent need to address the consequences of the large and growing numbers of people representing themselves in both family and civil court....[It is] likely that a substantial SRL population in the courts is here to stay.

– National SRL, pp.113 and 128

Litigants, and particularly self-represented litigants, are not, as they are too often seen, an inconvenience; they are why the system exists.... Court and tribunal services must provide appropriate services for self-represented litigants.

– NAC: Roadmap, pp.7 and 16

The system’s design is premised on the presence of lawyers.

– LCO: Family Justice, p.24

[T]here is a growing gap between what most SRLs need and the services that are available at courts.

– SRL White Paper, p.5

Judges, especially in family court, now find themselves dealing with SRL’s as often as with lawyers representing clients.... The influx of SRL’s into the family and civil courts has dramatically altered the judicial role.

– National SRL, pp.13 and 124
Both represented and unrepresented litigants must have real access to the civil justice system.
– Civil Justice Reform, p. 4

Within a short time almost all the SRL respondents became disillusioned, frustrated, and in some cases overwhelmed by the complexity of their case and the amount of time it was consuming.
– National SRL, p.9

Figures from Ontario show that ...in 2011/12, 64% of individuals involved in applications under the Family Law Act, the Children’s Law Reform Act or the Divorce Act were self-represented at the time of filing.
– National SRL, p.33

The criminal justice system often does not work as it should when an accused is not represented and cannot present or challenge the evidence in a meaningful way....Particularly in the context of long complex cases, the trial judge may find it necessary to appoint amicus curiae to assist the court or, in some exceptional circumstances, to appoint counsel for the accused in order to preserve the integrity of the process and ensure a fair trial.
– Large Criminal Cases, p.156

Theme #9: Creative solutions are required to make legal services more affordable

The affordability of legal services remains a critical aspect of access to justice that seriously affects low- and middle-income residents across Ontario. This is a huge factor that leads people to proceed without legal representation or to abandon attempts to resolve their legal issues. Recent reports comment on the future of legal billing practices, the need to increase legal aid funding and eligibility, and ways to increase affordability through early intervention and greater use of paralegals and multi-disciplinary teams.

A commitment to the availability of affordable legal services to a broad range of Canadians must be part of any responses to change in the next decade.
– Legal Futures, p.6

A critical barrier to the public’s access to the justice system is the cost of legal services, which can be prohibitive not only for the poor but also for the middle class.
– NAC: Legal Services, p.3
Today legal representation is primarily limited to persons with relatively high incomes or the very poor, and full legal representation only in the case of those with considerable discretionary resources. Yet the system is still for the most part based on the need for a lawyer.

– LCO: Family Justice, p.23

[Meaningful improvement in access to justice can be achieved only if the justice system can provide mechanisms for the more timely resolution of litigated disputes at a reasonable cost to both the plaintiff and the defendant.

– Civil Justice Reform, p.8

By far the most consistently cited reason for self-representation was the inability to afford to retain, or to continue to retain, legal counsel.... Financial retainers and services billed at a rate of $350-400 an hour are beyond the means of many Canadians.

– National SRL, pp.8 and 12

In many cases economic power has shifted to the consumer or client side, with buyers demanding more say on what lawyers do, how they do it, and how much and how they charge for it..... There is considerable resistance by clients to current pricing structures, including billable hours.

– Legal Futures, pp.4 and 21

Ontario lawyers should be encouraged to consider new and innovative billing methods that promote access to justice for litigants with civil legal issues who would not otherwise be able to afford counsel.

– Civil Justice Reform, p.ix

There is a growing consensus that [multidisciplinary teams are] a positive way forward, providing more affordable services to clients and adequate income to lawyers.

– Equal Justice, p.27

[Legal Aid] financial eligibility criteria need to be significantly raised to a more realistic level that bears some relationship to the actual circumstances of those in need.

– Legal Aid Review, p.177

Target: By 2020, all Canadians living at and below the poverty line... are eligible for full coverage of essential public legal services.

– Equal Justice, p.30
Making it Happen

Theme #10: Non-legal organizations have a vital role to play

Non-legal organizations play a vital role in prevention, legal information, triage and referral. They often serve as “trusted intermediaries” that help people recognize that they have a legal problem, provide preliminary information, and make referrals to legal service providers. Examples include Indian Friendship Centres, immigrant settlement agencies, shelters, violence prevention groups, disability organizations, health and social service providers, cultural and religious bodies, community centres, public libraries, and information and referral services (such as 211 Ontario). Efforts to enhance access to justice, especially at the front end, require collaboration among legal and non-legal organizations.

The key is to provide a seamless continuum of legal and non-legal services, and ensure that representation is available when needed to have meaningful access to justice.

– Equal Justice, p.16

When individuals do not recognize the legal aspect of their problem, trusted intermediaries trained to refer to appropriate legal services can provide a conduit to the justice system.

– NAC: Prevention, Triage, Referral, p.20

Trusted intermediaries play a critical role in ensuring low-income and disadvantaged people access and understand PLEI.

– Public Legal Education, p.27

Access to a “trusted intermediary” in a health, social service, or other organization is particularly important for persons who are isolated, not comfortable with technology, and less able to pursue self-help options.

– Connecting, p. 54

A more vulnerable person may need the assistance of a lawyer or paralegal while another individual may require access to clear and correct information.

– Mapping, p.7

One theory worth examining is that the market for legal services in Canada is actually growing, but that the lawyers’ share of this market is declining relative to non-lawyer providers.

– Legal Futures, p.17
The most common source of legal information for SRL’s are court staff....
The conventional distinction between legal information and legal advice requires urgent re-examination.
– National SRL, pp.10 and 117

Theme #11: Technology in the justice system has not kept pace

Various reports comment on the lack of technology developments in the justice sector, the need for specific technology solutions, and concerns about the impact of technology on vulnerable populations. Potential technology solutions include the expansion of online dispute resolution, videoconferencing, interactive court forms, simplified scheduling, e-filing and docket management, and electronic accessibility of court and tribunal documents.

While technological innovations are transforming much of modern life, they appear to be bypassing the justice system.
– NAC: Legal Services, p.3

Overall, the justice system has not been subject to the same technological transformation as other institutions.
– Equal Justice, p.10

The technology in all courts and tribunals must be modernized to a level that reflects the electronic needs, abilities and expectations of a modern society.
– NAC: Roadmap, p.16

Although online information may be helpful for many people, others will require in-person assistance to understand it.

Clients will likely expect their services to be delivered to them in familiar ways, such as over the internet
– Legal Futures, p.17

[T]he trend away from professional services and towards a “Do It Yourself” approach may be more closely related to the availability of information on the internet...than any particular dislike or mistrust of lawyers.
– National SRL, p.35

In the coming years, technology will play both a disruptive role in challenging the status quo and a transformative role in assisting the legal industry into new forms of service delivery, knowledge development, communications, management and administration.
– Legal Futures, p.27
Theme #12: Leadership and collaboration can help to bridge the “implementation gap”

A key concern is an apparent lack of capacity to move from sound recommendations in a report (or series of reports) to implementing those recommendations. This has been referred to as “the Implementation Gap” (NAC: Family Justice, p.8). There is the obvious challenge of finding resources in times of fiscal restraint. However, the divided responsibilities for different elements of the system also create impediments to moving forward with systemic change. Several recent reports therefore recommend strategies and structures to foster leadership and collaboration. This includes recommendations to create coordinated local Access to Justice Implementation Commissions (NAC: Roadmap, p.20) and to appoint Access to Justice Commissioners (CBA: Equal Justice, p.37). Collaboration is seen as a vital element for bridging the implementation gap.

– Listening, p.54

No one department or agency has sole responsibility for the delivery of justice in Canada. That, in our view, is a core reason for why the improvement of access to justice continues to be such a challenge.
– NAC: Roadmap, p.20

Improving access to justice in Canada is the responsibility of all players in the justice system, including judges, lawyers, all levels of government, paralegals, academics, NGOs, public legal educators and the public.
– NAC: Court Processes, p.25

[T]he most effective overall leadership could come by appointing access to justice commissioners, individuals given adequate resources and the mandate of striving for equal justice.
– Equal Justice, p.37

While cost is an extremely important consideration, there must also be consideration for the heavy cost both directly and indirectly in continuing to operate a confusing family justice system primarily premised on services that many people cannot afford.
– LCO: Family Justice, p.85

[T]here are many reasons to be optimistic....People within and beyond the civil and family justice system are increasingly engaged by access to justice challenges and many individuals and organizations are already working hard for change.
– NAC: Roadmap, p.24

[I]t is going to take more than wise advice to change the system.
– NAC: Family Justice, p.9

Introduction

This is the first of two background papers prepared for participants of the Access to Justice Symposium hosted by the Law Society of Upper Canada on October 29, 2013. It briefly describes legal organizations in Ontario and provides examples of their access to justice activities. The purpose is to stimulate discussion among Symposium participants about potential solutions, gaps and opportunities for collaboration. The paper is not intended to be comprehensive; rather it provides a brief “snapshot” and high level overview of access to roles and activities within the legal community.

Efforts to enhance access to justice involve a multitude of legal and non-legal organizations, often working in partnership with each other. The fact that this paper looks at legal organizations should not detract from the many non-legal organizations that play a vital role in legal information, referral, triage and prevention. They include Indian Friendship Centres, immigrant settlement agencies, shelters, violence prevention groups, disability organizations, health and social service providers, cultural and religious bodies, community centres, public libraries, and information and referral services (such as 211 Ontario).

The descriptions of legal organizations and their access to justice activities have been prepared with input from contacts from the organizations. The focus is on Ontario organizations, although some nationally based organizations have been included, especially those doing on the ground work in Ontario. We recognize that there is not always a clear line between a “legal” and “non-legal” organization, especially in the case of community organizations that provide information or education on legal topics. This paper is a draft that will be revised to add, modify or correct information following the Symposium discussions. Apologies to those we may have inadvertently omitted or insufficiently described.

Legal Institutions

The Law Society of Upper Canada

The Law Society of Upper Canada governs Ontario’s lawyers and paralegals in the public interest to ensure that the people of Ontario are served by professionals who meet high standards of learning, competence and professional conduct. In 2006, the Law Society was given an explicit statutory mandate to facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario. To further this objective, the Law Society established standing committees on Access to Justice and on Equity and Aboriginal Issues and co-sponsored the Ontario Civil Legal Needs research project which laid the groundwork for recent and future initiatives. Throughout 2013, the Law Society has been seeking advice on an enhanced role for itself through the Treasurer’s Advisory Group on Access to Justice (“TAG”). TAG has also served to facilitate broader dialogue on access to justice in Ontario and is proposed to become a standing forum for this dialogue.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Law Society Referral Service – up to 30 minutes free consultation with a lawyer or paralegal
- “Your Law: Ontario Law” videos on basic concepts such as hiring a lawyer or a paralegal, real estate transactions, wills and powers of attorney, family law, and personal injury matters
- Family Law Portal – designed to integrate Internet information on family law for the public
- Five-year review of the implementation of paralegal regulation
- Review and revision of regulations and rules – unbundled legal services; alternative billing structures; etc.
- Equity and diversity training and model policies; public education in partnership with community groups

The Law Foundation of Ontario (LFO)

The Law Foundation of Ontario funds programs that help people to understand the law and the justice system; help people to use the law to improve their lives; and foster excellence in the work of legal professionals. A priority for the LFO is improving access to justice for disadvantaged groups. The LFO’s main source of revenue is interest received from lawyers’ and paralegals’ mixed trust accounts. Other sources of revenue are court ordered cy-près awards and investment income. LFO grantees include many legal and non-legal organizations that further access to justice including Legal Aid Ontario, law schools and other organizations mentioned in this paper (e.g., Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted, Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic, Canadian Civil Liberties Education Trust, Law Commission of Ontario, Ontario Justice Education Network, Pro Bono Law Ontario, Pro Bono Students Canada).

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Grants that fund ideas generated by non-profit community groups to improve access to justice
- Access to Justice Fund: using cy-près awards to fund national and regional projects
- Connecting Project: improving linguistic and rural access to justice
- Administration of the Class Proceedings Fund: providing financial assistance to parties involved in class action lawsuits in the public interest
- Payment of 75% of net income from mixed trust accounts to Legal Aid Ontario, as required by the Law Society Act

Legal Aid Ontario (LAO)

Legal Aid Ontario has a statutory mandate to promote access to justice for low-income individuals throughout Ontario. Its role is to provide high-quality legal aid services in a cost-effective and efficient manner, to facilitate flexibility and innovation in the provision of legal aid services, to identify, assess and recognize the diverse legal needs of low-income individuals and of disadvantaged communities in Ontario, and to operate independently from the Government of Ontario but within a framework of accountability for the expenditure of public funds.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Toll-free number, including summary legal advice for family and criminal law matters, available in 120 languages
- 56 legal aid offices in courthouses throughout the province
- Duty counsel services for people who arrive in criminal, family or youth courts without a lawyer
- Francophone legal advice line
- Issuing certificates to enable eligible low-income clients to retain a private lawyer for the most serious and complex cases
- Funding independent, community-based clinics to provide poverty law services
- Funding Student Legal Aid Services Societies operating out of Ontario law schools
- Refugee Law Office and current review of delivery of refugee law services
- Renewed Aboriginal Justice Strategy
- Mental Health strategy
- Public Legal Education website, LawFacts.ca, providing in-depth legal information and resources pertaining to criminal and refugee law. Content for Family, Aboriginal, and mental health law is coming Fall 2013.

The Law Commission of Ontario (LCO)

The Law Commission of Ontario is an independent organization that researches issues and recommends law reform measures to make the law accessible to all Ontario communities. Its mandate includes stimulating critical debate about the law. It works on a wide range of projects, from short and narrow projects (focused on specific laws) to long projects that require multidisciplinary research and analysis (that might affect many laws). The LCO was created by an Agreement among The Law Foundation of Ontario, the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General, the Dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, and The Law Society of Upper Canada (all of whom provide funding) and the Ontario law deans. It receives funding and in-kind support from York University.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

Research Projects Underway

- Class Actions and Review of Class Proceedings Act
- Capacity of Adults with Mental Disabilities and the Federal Registered Disability Savings Plan
- Legal Capacity, Decision-making and Guardianship
- Modernization of the Forestry Workers Lien for Wages Act
• Specialized Procedure for Administration of Small Estates

Completed Projects
• Charging Fees for Cashing Government Cheques

• Family Law Reform
• Vulnerable Workers and Precarious Work
• Modernization of the Provincial Offences Act
• Framework for the Law as It Affects Persons with Disabilities
• Framework for the Law as It Affects Older Adults
• Law school curriculum modules for teaching about violence against women

Other Activities
• Roundtables on joint and several liability under Ontario Business Corporations Act and on family law
• Symposium on conversations about law reform
• Co-hosting conferences on elder law, e-health law and policy, and the law and ethics of investigative journalism

Provincial and Local Services

Community Legal Clinics

Ontario’s community legal clinics are independent, non-profit corporations that receive the bulk of their funding from Legal Aid Ontario. Clinic lawyers and legal workers provide poverty law services that help low-income and disadvantaged people to meet their most basic needs: a source of income, a roof over their heads, human rights, access to health care, education, etc. The three defining characteristics of the clinics are local community governance, practice in poverty law, and legal response through a broad array of services.

The Association of Community Legal Clinics of Ontario (ACLCO) serves its members as the voice of the clinic system to Legal Aid Ontario, the Law Society of Upper Canada, government, law schools, the media, and the general public.
Sample Access to Justice Activities

Ongoing Work
- Case work and legal representation in areas of law that particularly affect low-income individuals and communities
- Community development, public legal education and law reform activities to achieve systemic solutions to systemic legal issues confronting low income communities

Examples of Strategic Initiatives and Partnerships
- Co-location of Rexdale clinic in a community hub, sharing space with local community agencies serving mutual clients
- A “connecting region” initiative led by the South Ottawa clinic to formally link agencies serving the low-income population in the South Ottawa community
- “Housing as a Right” test case led by Advocacy Centre for Tenants Ontario (ACTO) on behalf of four individuals and a community organization under ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms
- International conference on workers compensation - organized by academics, legal clinics, and injured workers - to be attended by injured workers from across the province (with Law Foundation funding)
- A Strategic Plan for Ontario’s community legal clinic system to expand client access to poverty law services; enhance capacity for systemic work; strengthen community connections; and enhance system-wide coordination and support
- The Knowledge Now project to enhance knowledge sharing among clinics, with support from the Legal Aid Ontario Innovations Fund

Pro Bono Law Ontario (PBLO)

Pro Bono Law Ontario is a charity founded in 2001 to bridge the justice gap between lawyers who want to give back and the many Ontarians who can’t afford legal services and have a legal problem not covered by legal aid. PBLO creates and manages volunteer programs that connect these lawyers with low-income Ontarians – either directly or in partnership with charitable organizations working in the community. PBLO serves over 13,000 clients each year who have nowhere else to turn. The demand for these services increases each year. PBLO is funded by The Law Foundation of Ontario, The Law Society of Upper Canada, and private donations.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Creating and managing pro bono projects, brokering partnerships and providing consulting services to other groups interested in organized pro bono projects, and addressing regulatory barriers to participation
- Creating and directly managing three streams of programs serving at-risk children and youth, unrepresented litigants, and charitable organizations
- Brokering partnerships to connect charitable organizations with law firms, law associations, and legal departments
- Working with law firms, law associations and legal departments to develop policies that facilitate pro bono participation on an institutional level
- Using technology to deliver legal information and self-help resources (like court form completion software) to the public
- Bringing legal services to people in need, e.g. Court based self-help centres and medical legal partnerships in Ontario’s children’s hospitals
Ontario Justice Education Network (OJEN)

The Ontario Justice Education Network promotes understanding, education, and dialogue to support a responsive and inclusive justice system in Ontario. OJEN carries out its mandate through education and advocacy programs that focus on engaging Ontario’s youth in a positive way with Ontario’s justice system. OJEN receives funding from the Law Foundation of Ontario, the Department of Justice Canada, and the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Delivery of justice education projects across the province for approximately 200,000 young people annually, facilitating direct access to judges, justices of the peace, lawyers, and legal professionals, at no cost, in both official languages
- Development of preventative strategies for meaningful justice education provincially, nationally and internationally
- Training high school law teachers and providing free classroom resources
- Working with the Ontario Ministry of the Education to revise the high school curriculum relating to legal issues to reflect pressing and emerging legal needs
- Outreach to communities with historically negative interactions with the justice system to build knowledge and confidence and to introduce youth and families to sources of help (high-risk, newcomer, Aboriginal and Francophone youth and children)

Community Legal Education Ontario (CLEO)

CLEO is an independent non-profit organization that specializes in public legal education and information. It produces clear, accurate, and practical legal rights information to help people who have low incomes or face other barriers, such as language or literacy, to understand and exercise their legal rights. It also supports other community groups in their public legal education work.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Specialty community legal clinic produces clear language legal information resources on high-need legal topics, in a variety of languages and formats
- “Your Legal Rights” website offers legal information on a wide range of topics, in a variety of languages, compiled from legal information resources of more than 800 organizations
- Centre for Research & Innovation conducts research and projects to help build the capacity of community organizations to develop and deliver effective legal rights information
- Connecting Communities project fosters training partnerships between legal and community organizations to improve access to legal information and referral for people who do not speak English or French or who live in rural or remote communities
- Public Legal Education Learning Exchange supports organizations across Ontario in providing effective PLE for their communities by hosting a website and networking opportunities to share research, tools, and promising practices
Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic

The Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic is a not for profit organization providing multi-disciplinary services (legal, counselling and language interpretation) to women who are victims of violence. The Clinic assists women build lives free from violence and ensures women’s access justice and other vital services they require for their protection and long term well-being. This Clinic is not part of the LAO funded system of community legal clinics. It is funded primarily by the province of Ontario as well as the Ontario Women’s Directorate, the City of Toronto, the United Way of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Women’s Foundation, The Law Foundation of Ontario, the Pacifica Fund at the Toronto Community Foundation, and many other corporate and individuals donors.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Legal help in family, immigration and criminal law
- Counselling support
- Interpretation and translation in more than 90 languages
- Advocacy for law reform and social changes that benefit women

Office of the Worker Adviser (OWA)

The Office of the Worker Adviser educates, advises and represents non-union workers and their survivors when the worker has been injured at work. The OWA also represents non-union workers who have been threatened or punished for following health and safety laws. The OWA is an independent agency of the Ontario Ministry of Labour. Its services are free and confidential. The OWA was established by statute in 1985, along with the Office of the Employer Adviser and the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Advice, education, and representation at the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal, and the Ontario Labour Relations Board
- Self-help information for workers to handle their own claims or applications where appropriate
- Community partnerships with other groups that assist injured workers or who promote health and safety in the workplace
- Educational services in local communities on topics related to the OWA mandate
- System improvement partnerships and activities

Office of the Employer Adviser (OEA)

The Office of the Employer Adviser provides Ontario employers with free and confidential advice, representation and education on workers’ compensation issues under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, and on unjust reprisal issues under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. The OEA was created by statute in 1985 as an independent agency of the Ministry of Labour. It provides advice to any size employer and represents primarily employers who employ fewer than 100 employees in workers’ compensation matters. It represents employers with fewer than 50 employees in reprisal disputes.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Advice and representation of employers in workers’ compensation appeals at the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board and the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal
- Advice and representation of employers in unjust reprisal matters at the Ontario Labour Relations Board
- Publications designed to meet the day-to-day needs of employers regarding the workplace safety and insurance system
- Proactive strategies for employers to help them avoid becoming involved in unjust reprisal proceedings
- Online webinars and educational seminars to inform and educate employers about their rights and obligations

Human Rights Legal Support Centre

The Human Rights Legal Support Centre is an independent agency funded by the Ontario Government through the Ministry of the Attorney General. It offers human rights legal services to people who have experienced discrimination contrary to Ontario’s Human Rights Code. The Centre has regional staff in Windsor, Sault Ste. Marie, Thunder Bay, Guelph, Ottawa and Brampton.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Special service protocol enabling Aboriginal clients to be served by an Aboriginal lawyer
- Policy to accommodate a variety of physical, mental, language and cultural needs
- Outreach to communities that face cultural and linguistic barriers in accessing the Centre’s services
- Community and continuing legal educational programs on human rights

National Services

Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted (AIDWYC)

AIDWYC is dedicated to identifying, advocating for, and exonerating individuals convicted of a crime that they did not commit and to preventing such injustices in the future through education and reform. AIDWYC has played a significant role in the exoneration of eighteen wrongly convicted Canadians.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Reviewing and supporting claims of innocence in homicide cases
- Delivering Public Legal Education on topics related to wrongful convictions in marginalized communities
- Coordinating Continuing Legal Education events for lawyers, police, the judiciary and Aboriginal court workers in the hopes of preventing wrongful convictions
- Raising public awareness about miscarriages of justice through speaking engagements and the AIDWYC website and blog
Intervening in legal cases which seek to rectify miscarriages of justice
Participating in public inquiries related to wrongful convictions

Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA)

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association is a national, non-partisan, independent, non-profit organization that promotes respect for and observance of fundamental human rights and civil liberties and that defends, extends, and fosters recognition of these rights and liberties. The CCLA’s work focuses on four thematic areas: fundamental freedoms, public safety, national security, and equality. CCLA has always been backed financially only by its members and supporters. It has neither sought nor received any government money.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Defending human rights and civil liberties through public education, litigation, citizen’s engagement, monitoring and research
- Convening conferences and public education programs through its foundation, the Canadian Civil Liberties Education Trust
- Engaging volunteers to keep informed of how civil liberties are observed throughout the country
- Intervention in court cases to represent a human rights and civil liberties perspective

Pro Bono Students Canada (PBSC)

Pro Bono Students Canada is a national, award-winning program with chapters at 21 law schools across the country, including every Ontario law school. By exposing law students to the value of public service, PBSC aims to encourage the next generation of lawyers to make pro bono an everyday part of their practice.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Placement of law student volunteers in community organizations, legal centres and clinics, law firms and courts and tribunals, training them to provide high quality, professional legal assistance to vulnerable populations and individuals and to non-profit organizations
- Supervised opportunities for students to develop legal skills while increasing access to justice in diverse communities across Canada. Flagship projects include:
  - Family Law Project: document preparation for unrepresented litigants
  - Tax Advocacy project: representing appellants in the informal procedure in the Tax Court of Canada
  - Wills Clinic: preparing wills and powers of attorney, and delivering public legal information sessions
- Campus events to promote the value of public interest lawyering and pro bono service

Women’s Legal Education and Advocacy Fund (LEAF)

Founded in 1985, LEAF is a national, non-profit organization that exists to advance the equality of women and girls through litigation, law reform and public education. LEAF addresses inequality and injustice issues experienced by the most marginalized women who are disproportionately disadvantaged by poverty, racism, disability, colonialism and sexism. LEAF works to ensure Canadian courts provide the equality rights guaranteed to women and girls by Section 15 of the Canadian Charter.
Legal Organizations and Access to Justice Activities in Ontario – October 29, 2013

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Intervention to help win landmark legal victories in crucial areas such as violence against women, discrimination, sexual harassment, sex discrimination in employment standards, social assistance, unfair pensions, family law and reproductive rights
- Involvement over the past twenty-eight years in over 150 cases on equality rights, addressing issues such as reproductive freedoms, pay equity, employment, housing, immigration, family law, sexual violence, sexual orientation and disability accommodation for women and marginalized groups

Legal Associations: General

Individual lawyers and paralegals contribute to access to justice in many ways. This can include pro bono services, unbundled legal services, alternative billing arrangements, and specialized firms. They also contribute through the legal associations to which they belong.

Ontario Bar Association (OBA) and Canadian Bar Association (CBA)

The Canadian Bar Association (CBA) represents some 37,000 lawyers, judges, notaries, law teachers, and law students from across Canada. Approximately two-thirds of all practising lawyers in Canada belong to the CBA. The Ontario Bar Association (OBA) is a branch of the CBA and is the largest voluntary legal advocacy organization in Ontario, representing some 18,000 members on the frontlines of our justice system in no fewer than 38 different sectors and in every region of the province. The CBA-OBA mandate is, among other things, to improve and promote access to justice and equality in the legal profession and the justice system.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

CBA Reaching Equal Justice

- Ongoing CBA initiative offering a comprehensive strategic framework to overcome existing barriers, with 31 targets for attaining equal justice by 2030. Each target offers actions that can begin immediately, interim actions or milestones to mark progress along the way, as well as the final target or end goal. The Reaching Equal Justice Report invites collaborative action by all members of the justice community, in an attempt to “balance the scales” of justice in Canada. http://www.cba.org/CBA/equaljustice/secure_pdf/Equal-Justice-Report-eng.pdf

CBA Legal Futures Initiative

Additional Activities: OBA

- OBA Access to Justice Committee, with pro-bono and paralegal subcommittees
- OBA Working Group on Court Delay
- OBA “Find a Lawyer” service for the public
Additional Activities: CBA
- CBA Access to Justice Committee
- CBA Legal Aid Liaison Committee, including Legal Aid Leader recognition program and Legal Aid Watch
- CBA Pro Bono Committee

The Advocates’ Society

The Advocates’ Society is a professional association for advocates with over 5,000 members from the bench and bar throughout Ontario and across Canada. The Society is dedicated to promoting excellence in advocacy and the highest standards of professionalism within a fair and accessible system of justice. The Society is Canada’s premier provider of advocacy skills training and plays a prominent role in contributing to justice reform initiatives, preserving and strengthening the role of advocates, and ensuring access to justice. The Society is also committed to giving back to the community, and administers and participates in a number of pro bono initiatives.

County and District Law Presidents’ Association (CDLPA)

The County & District Law Presidents’ Association provides insight and comment on issues affecting the legal profession in Ontario, particularly around access to justice. In affiliation with the Toronto Lawyers Association, the CDLPA represents the interests of over 12,000 practicing lawyers through a volunteer Executive Board that is elected from among Ontario’s 46 county law associations. Many of these lawyers are directly engaged in practice areas which focus on the legal needs of individuals in the province of Ontario, such as family, criminal, wills and estates and small business. They see and understand first-hand the challenges that exist within the current legal system, and are committed to finding solutions on behalf of the public they serve. This broad-based voice of the practicing bar of Ontario gives CDLPA a unique and powerful voice at the grassroots of the practice of law.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Finding ways to support solo practitioners and small/midsize firms in order to maintain their presence in all jurisdictions around the province for the benefit of their local communities
- Participation in the Alliance for Sustainable Legal Aid
- Participation in the Working Group on Real Estate
- Providing comments on other important practice issues impacting on the operation and accessibility of the justice system as they arise
- Regular submissions to the Law Society, the Province of Ontario, community justice partners, the media and the general public as part of CDLPA’s commitment to being the voice of the practicing Bar in Ontario

Criminal Lawyers’ Association (CLA)

The Criminal Lawyers’ Association is a specialty legal organization that serves as a voice for criminal justice and civil liberties in Canada. The CLA provides advice and perspective to governments and the judiciary on issues relating to legislation and the administration of criminal justice. It also assists its members in every aspect of the practice of criminal litigation. The Association is often called upon to seek intervenor status in cases before the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada.
Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Routinely make submissions to Legislative Committees at both the Commons and Senate level as well as Provincial Legislatures on all proposed Bills affecting criminal justice
- Advocacy for a strong, independent and well-funded legal aid program as a key to equal access to justice for persons charged with criminal offences
- Provision of continuing professional development programs for criminal law practitioners
- Active participant in court administrative committees throughout the province

Family Lawyers Association (FLA)

The Family Lawyers Association is a group of lawyers in Ontario who are actively involved in family law and who wish to share their experiences with other lawyers throughout the province. The Family Lawyers Association provides information to its members and serves as a voice for its members on issues affecting the practice of family law.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Participating in committees and initiatives in the areas of Legal Aid, law reform and various family law Bench and Bar Associations

Ontario Trial Lawyers Association (OTLA)

The Ontario Trial Lawyers Association is an organization of more than 1,400 plaintiff lawyers, law clerks, articling students and law students. Its purpose is to promote access to justice for all Ontarians, preserve and improve the civil justice system, and advocate for the rights of those who have suffered injury and losses as the result of wrongdoing by others, while at the same time advocating strongly for safety initiatives. Priorities include a continued focus on advocacy for a fair civil justice system.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Standing committee on Access to Justice
- Collaboration with community partners on initiatives that work for access to justice and a fair insurance system
- Regular submissions to promote fair access to court system without undue delays
- Safety initiatives to prevent injury from occurring
- Safety awards to recognize work in community
- Award for outstanding contribution to the goals of a fair trial and access to justice, as an advocate, in legal scholarship, continuing legal education, legal writing, journalism, politics or government
- Regular continuing legal education and promoting ongoing public education on access to justice

Refugee Lawyers’ Association of Ontario (RLA)

The Refugee Lawyers’ Association of Ontario is an association of approximately 200 lawyers in the Province of Ontario in Canada advocating on behalf of refugees. The RLA shares information and updates regarding refugee determination in Canada, provides links to source country information, and comments on important court decisions in refugee law. The Association includes lawyers in private practice as well as Legal Aid clinic and staff lawyers.
Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Advocating to ensure accessibility of lawyers for refugees and refugee claimants, adequate funding for Legal Aid, and minimum standards of representation for refugees and refugee claimants
- Working in cooperation with other legal service providers and associations to support a sustainable Legal Aid plan
- Sharing legal education and information for refugee lawyers

Paralegal Society of Ontario (PSO)

The Paralegal Society of Ontario represents the interests of licensed paralegals across Ontario. It provides educational events, engages in government and college relations, and advocates for paralegals.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Assists the public in finding a paralegal in various practice areas
- Commitment to educating the public about paralegals and the paralegal profession

Licensed Paralegals Association (Ontario) (LPA)

The Licensed Paralegals Association (Ontario) is the largest collective of licensed paralegals directly offering legal services to Ontarians. By providing continuing professional development courses, current practice management tips, and ongoing mentoring, the LPA fosters an environment of continuous learning.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Supports access to justice and encourages the public to confidently utilize the services of licensed paralegals in permitted areas of practice

Legal Associations: Demographic

- Arab Canadian Lawyers Association (ACLA)
- Association des juristes d’expression française de l’Ontario (AJEFO)
- Canadian Association of Black Lawyers (CABL)
- Canadian Muslim Lawyers Association (CMLA)
- Federation of Asian Canadian Lawyers (FACL)
- Hellenic Canadian Lawyers Association (HCLA)
- Hispanic Ontario Lawyers Association (HOLA)
- Indigenous Bar Association (IBA)
- Iranian Canadian Lawyers’ Association (ICLA)
- Korean Canadian Lawyers Association (KCLA)
South Asian Bar Association of Toronto (SABA-Toronto)
Women’s Law Association of Ontario (WLAO)

Many associations, such as the examples listed above, serve as a voice for members of the legal profession from specific demographic groups. These associations play an important role in access to justice by helping to ensure that people from the groups have access to a strong cadre of legal professionals who understand their culture, language or specific needs and by advocating on public policy issues to advance legal and social justice.

Activities of such associations typically include:
- Serving as a spokesperson and networking forum for their members
- Promoting public awareness and reform of policies and laws affecting the target populations
- Promoting equal opportunity, legal scholarship, professional excellence, and community involvement
- Offering mentorship for students and practitioners
- Providing seminars, speakers’ forums and other educational opportunities

Courts and Tribunals

Court of Appeal for Ontario

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal for Ontario includes the consideration of civil and criminal appeals from decisions of Ontario’s two trial courts, the Superior Court of Justice and the Ontario Court of Justice. At the Opening of the Courts of Ontario in September 2012, Chief Justice Warren K. Winkler stressed the importance of access to justice in upholding the rule of law. At the Opening in 2013, he said, “There is today an overwhelming consensus that if the justice system as we know it is to survive, it must undergo significant change to provide greater access to justice for the public”.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Ontario Courts Accessibility Committee which is helping to increase the accessibility of courthouse facilities and proceedings, with membership from all levels of court, the Bar, the Ministry of the Attorney General, and people with disabilities
- Programs initiated with the bar, Pro Bono Law Ontario and Legal Aid Ontario to provide legal services for unrepresented persons during inmate appeals, mental health appeals, civil appeals, and motions
- Self-help packages on the website to guide individuals through the steps to bring an appeal or motion, with links to organizations that might be of assistance
- Chief Justice’s Committee on Professionalism which gets lawyers more involved in making the system work smoothly

Superior Court of Justice

The Superior Court of Justice has jurisdiction over criminal, civil and family cases, presiding in fifty-one locations in Ontario. In “Mapping the Way Forward”, the Court’s 2012 Annual Report, Chief Justice Heather J. Smith stated, “In each of these three areas of law, the Superior Court remains dedicated to providing meaningful, effective, and timely access to justice”.

Prioritizing Children
Chief Justice Smith indicated in her Opening of Courts speeches, in both September 2012 and 2013, that in 2012 the Superior Court embarked on the “Prioritizing Children” initiative, which focussed on improving access to justice for families in crisis and children at risk, particularly in child protection proceedings. The Chief Justice has met with and has received commitments to support this initiative from the Treasurer, the law deans, CBA and OBA representatives, the Children’s Lawyer, and legal assistance organizations.

Scheduling Practices
Chief Justice Smith recently announced the 2013 strategic priority for the court. The court has embarked on a full scale internal review of its judicial scheduling practices, to maximize the effectiveness of its judicial resources and available facilities, to provide more timely access to justice, particularly in civil interlocutory proceedings.

Reducing Wait Times
The court has begun an initiative for the Greater Toronto Area, to reduce the undue wait times for long motions and long trials, principally in Toronto. The judicial lead for this initiative, Justice Geoffrey Morawetz, will value the Bar’s input in resolving this issue.

Technology
To more effectively harness technology to improve access to justice, the Superior Court led two significant initiatives in 2013. First, the court developed its own protocol to allow all parties to easily access copies of the court’s digital audio recordings. Second, the court crafted and implemented a court-wide policy that permits the use of electronic devices in the courtroom for parties and their counsel, and for members of the press, because they function as the eyes and ears of the public.

E-Filing
While the court eagerly awaits the technology-based initiatives the Attorney General has planned, the court’s judges have proactively joined with the Bar to move towards the kind of accessible “e-filing” system that will ultimately become the backbone for the administration of justice. The thoughtful and detailed standards developed for delivering e-documents in Commercial List and Divisional Court cases will, no doubt, become the standard for the true “e-filing” system of the future.

Ontario Court of Justice

The Ontario Court of Justice presides over adult criminal, youth criminal, family law, child protection, and provincial offence matters. The Ontario Court of Justice is the largest court in the country, with judges and justices of the peace sitting in close to 200 locations throughout Ontario. In her remarks at the Opening of the Courts of Ontario in September 2012, Chief Justice Annemarie E. Bonkalo stated that, “As society evolves, so too must our courts. Whether in family, criminal, youth or provincial offences matters, our Court always seeks opportunities to provide more innovative and accessible service delivery options.” During the 2013 Opening, she stressed the Court’s focus on access to justice and efforts to modernize the court and demystify the court process.
Sample Access to Justice Activities

- Web-based user guides for defendants in provincial offences cases, accused persons in criminal trials, and self-represented persons at family law trials
- Fly-In Court Working Group report to enhance operations of criminal and family fly-in courts held in First Nations communities in the Northwest and Northeast Regions of Ontario
- Public legal education activities of judges and justices of the peace, in classrooms and other settings
- Streamlining of criminal, family and provincial offence processes
- Implementing in-court orders to reduce waiting time for litigants regarding document preparation
- Posting of court statistics for public transparency

Administrative Tribunals

Many legal matters in Ontario are resolved through specialized adjudicative tribunals established by provincial or federal legislation. The nature and extent of access to justice activities in the tribunal sector can vary considerably depending on the individual tribunal or cluster of tribunals.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

Policies and Procedures
- Service Equity Policy: created by the Society of Ontario Adjudicators and Regulators (SOAR) to provide equity and access for disadvantaged persons
- Training in cultural competencies by SOAR and the Council of Canadian Administrative Tribunals
- Training for adjudicators in mediation and accessibility
- Training on the impact of poverty and mental health on parties’ ability to interact with the legal process (Social Justice Tribunals Ontario)
- “Active adjudication” to assist self-represented parties
- Voluntary mediation programs
- Access to interpreters during tribunal hearings
- Production of decisions in accessible formats

Clustering
- Improving access to justice is one of the goals behind the recent creation of three “clusters” involving seventeen of Ontario’s tribunals:
  - Environment and Land Tribunals Ontario (ELTO)
  - Social Justice Tribunals Ontario (SJTO)
  - Safety, Licence Appeals and Standards Tribunals Ontario (SLASTO)
- Common information portals for clusters of tribunals

Governments

Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General (MAG)

The Ministry of the Attorney General’s role includes court services to support an independent judiciary, prosecution of offences, conducting civil litigation on behalf of government, services for victims and vulnerable persons, justice policy, and legislative drafting. MAG liaises with other Ontario government... ministries on access to justice issues and is responsible for a variety of arms-length agencies and tribunals.

Sample Access to Justice Activities

Information and Guides
- Justice Ontario: a one-stop source of information about Ontario’s legal system, including a toll-free telephone line with service in 173 languages. Topics include: Finding a lawyer, Tickets and fines, Lawsuits and disputes, Family and criminal law, Human rights, Wills and estates
- Nine guides for bringing or replying to a Small Claims Court claim, including the enforcement of court orders
- Culturally appropriate family law information for Aboriginal families, with materials in English, French, Ojibway, Cree and Oji-Cree

Technology
- Ontario Court Forms Assistant, an online program that guides litigants through a series of plain language questions to populate commonly used Small Claims Court and family law forms
- Pre-formatted, fillable forms available on the Ontario Court Forms website for Small Claims Court actions and non-contentious estate applications

Family Justice Services
- Expansion of mediation, mandatory information, and Information and Referral Co-ordinator services to all family courts in the province

Justice on Target (JOT)
- Addressing criminal court delay by using an evidence-based approach to increase the effectiveness of criminal court practices, e.g.:
  - Early information, forms and orientation to help accused persons prepare for court
  - Putting legal aid on-site in Ontario’s courthouses so accused persons can apply immediately for legal aid and those who qualify can quickly retain counsel
  - Guidelines for holding low-risk offenders accountable through community service, restitution, charitable donation, or attending programming or counselling

Department of Justice Canada (DOJ)

The federal Department of Justice acts as a policy department to oversee matters relating to the administration of justice that fall within the federal domain, helping to ensure a fair, relevant and accessible justice system for all Canadians. In addition to policy advice and program services, it provides a range of legal advisory, litigation and legislative services to government departments and agencies. The Department also serves as a central agency to support the Minister in advising Cabinet on all legal matters.

Sample Access to Justice Activities
- Published research and reports on a variety of access to justice issues including criminal justice, family law, Aboriginal communities, and creating a more efficient and accessible justice system
- Participation in the National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters
- Aboriginal Court Worker Program
- Aboriginal Justice Strategy
Legal Aid Program
International Legal Programs
Public Legal Education and Information Support Official Languages Initiatives
Department of Justice Canada Pro Bono Pilot Project

Faculties of Law

Student Legal Aid Societies

Student Legal Aid Services Societies operate out of Ontario’s law schools. Under the supervision of full time lawyers, volunteer law students provide legal advice and represent clients in cases involving minor crimes, landlord and tenant disputes, immigration issues and tribunals. Funding and support are provided from the universities and Legal Aid Ontario. Law Schools also collaborate with community legal clinics such as the University of Windsor’s Legal Assistance of Windsor program and Osgoode Hall Law School’s long-standing partnership with Parkdale Community Legal Services.

Clinical Programs

In additional to regular classroom courses, Ontario’s law schools offer clinical programs with an intensive focus on particular areas of law, legal skills or client communities. Clinical programs provide law students with advanced skills and experience through experiential learning. Many clinical programs – including placement at a student legal aid society – focus on vulnerable groups. A recent example is the Disability Law program created by Osgoode Hall Law School in partnership with ARCH Disability Law Centre.

Pro Bono Services

As described earlier, Ontario law students provide volunteer legal services through chapters of Pro Bono Students Canada. Students also volunteer through pro bono law school clinics such as the Ecojustice Clinic at the University of Ottawa.

New Faculty of Law at Lakehead University

The Lakehead University Faculty of Law is Ontario’s first new law school in Ontario in forty-four years. Its first class of students began in September, 2013. This law school is committed to improving access to legal services in Northern Ontario and throughout rural Canada – all places where there is a need for lawyers. It will focus on admitting students from towns across the north, as well as throughout the rest of Ontario and rural or small town Canada. It will emphasize access to justice in non-metropolitan communities by preparing graduates to practise in smaller centres and in smaller firms. In addition to the core curriculum, the program will focus on three main areas: Aboriginal Law and issues related to Aboriginal peoples; establishing a law practice in a small centre; and an emphasis on Natural Resources, with specialties in mining and forestry.
Faculties of Law: Selected Access to Justice Activities

The table below provides additional examples of access to justice activities at Ontario faculties of law. The examples were drawn from a larger table entitled “Access to Justice Initiatives in Canadian Law Schools” that was submitted to the National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters (NAC).

Creating a Climate for Change
Report from TAG Symposium, October 29, 2013

In January of 2013, Treasurer Thomas G. Conway established the Treasurer’s Advisory Group on Access to Justice (TAG) to gather input and advice as the Law Society of Upper Canada considered how to enhance its role on these issues and better fulfill its statutory mandate to “act so as to facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario.”

On October 29, 2013, eighty individuals dedicated to improving access to justice gathered for a symposium that furthered the goals of TAG. The objectives were to:

- Facilitate dialogue with a cross-section of individuals committed to access to justice in Ontario
- Enhance awareness of current activities and recommendations
- Discuss ways to enhance collaboration, coordination and engagement on access to justice issues
- Solicit further ideas about the role of the Law Society in meeting its statutory mandate

In his opening remarks, Treasurer Conway encouraged participants to engage in concrete and practical discussions about structures and mechanisms for implementing change to make the justice system more accessible for the people of Ontario.

See Appendix A: Agenda and Appendix B: Participant List.

Setting the Stage

Dark Sky / Blue Sky
A multi-media presentation entitled Dark Sky/Blue Sky was shown to the symposium participants. The presentation contains video clips and quotes gathered from members of the public during the Canadian Bar Association’s Envisioning Equal Justice initiative, in collaboration with Pro Bono Students Canada and the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice.

In the video, “Dark Sky/Blue Sky”, you heard voices explaining clearly and eloquently that today, justice is not accessible to them.
--Chief Justice Bonkalo, Ontario Court of Justice

Address by Chief Justice Annemarie Bonkalo, Ontario Court of Justice
Chief Justice Bonkalo thanked the Treasurer for establishing the Treasurer’s Advisory Group on Access to Justice and for bringing everyone together for the symposium. She recommends defining our work ahead as achievable goals to achieve concrete access to justice objectives. She cautioned that we can no longer accept the status quo and continue doing things simply because we have always done them that way. Chief Justice Bonkalo highlighted areas where her Court has led initiatives to meet the needs of communities, promote accessible and useful information about the workings of the Court, build a network of services for families in crisis, and harness technology to modernize operations.

Overview of Symposium Background Papers
Karen Cohl provided an overview of the two background papers she had prepared for symposium participants. The papers were created to provide “food for thought” in discussions about potential solutions, gaps and opportunities for collaboration.

The first paper, Legal Organizations and Access to Justice Activities in Ontario, contains a brief description of legal organizations in Ontario and examples of their access to justice activities. The second paper, Access to Justice Themes: “Quotable Quotes”, proposes themes from recent Ontario and national access to justice reports, using quotations from the reports to illustrate each theme.

Roadmap for Change: Where do we go from here?

Presentation by Justice Thomas Cromwell, Supreme Court of Canada
Justice Cromwell presented A Roadmap for Change, the final report of the National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters. The report promotes a broad understanding of access to justice; promotes a new way of thinking to guide reform; and provides a roadmap for change governed by six guiding principles. Justice Cromwell encouraged the group to think about why there are so many ideas and so little action. He noted that a major impediment is the lack of coherent leadership and institutional structures to design, implement and coordinate change. He also encouraged the group to find ways to connect people to lawyers and cautioned that we not just accept that there are so many self-represented litigants.

Question and Answer Session
Following the presentation, Law Society bencher William McDowell facilitated a question and answer session with the symposium participants and Justice Cromwell and the Treasurer. The following list summarizes ideas and perspectives put forward during this session.

- Consult with business leaders and entrepreneurs for change management ideas.
• Ensure that “putting people first” encompasses an equity principle that includes racialized, low-income people.
• Include tribunal reform in access to justice.
• We must keep pace with technology to hear from youth and how they prefer to communicate with their lawyers.
• The Law Society needs to be less distant and exclusive in order to engage with civil society.
• Provide professional development on legal topics to settlement and social workers.
• Create a “529 LAW” number as a triage line that refers people to an organization that can help with a legal problem.
• Encourage local access to justice working groups – it is at the local level where we help people find paths to justice.
• The system should not regard self-represented litigants as aberrant or as second class citizens. Judicial training is an important component of addressing this issue.
• Some self-represented litigants who participated in the National SRL project are available to participate in justice system reform activities.
• Education about the justice system should begin in elementary school.
• Include paralegals in multi-disciplinary and team approaches to legal services.
• Courts and tribunals should think about self-represented litigants as an institutional responsibility. That will lead to greater consistency and confidence.

Workshops
Symposium participants broke into groups for workshop sessions in the afternoon. Each of the five workshops had a different topic for discussion, with the primary objective of soliciting input into an appropriate role for the Law Society on these issues. Each workshop was chaired by a team of two Law Society benchers from the TAG Working Group and was held twice so that each participant could engage on two topics. Overall leadership for the workshops was provided by Howard Goldblatt, vice-chair of the TAG Working Group.

Workshop #1:
Engaging the Public

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Questions for Discussion</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>• How do we ensure that the voice of the public/user is reflected as we change and innovate?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• What mechanisms exist or can be created to gather input from system users and to reflect back to them how their input or ideas have been used or considered?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• Can we influence Ontarians’ investment in justice issues, in turn generating the political will for change and innovation? How?</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Discussion and Input:

• Create a role for the Law Society – not to deliver services but to build partnerships with others.
• Create a campaign about how important access to justice is for every citizen – whether they have a legal problem now or in the future.
• Replicate this symposium in regions across the province, with CDLPA as a partner.
• Offer public education and outreach for the public where they are (e.g. libraries, community organizations) and before they are in crisis.
• As part of the regulator’s role in entrance into the profession, find ways in which demand and supply issues can benefit the general population seeking justice.
• Discuss possible role for paralegals under supervision in family law
• Pro bono: institute a pay or play requirement for lawyers.
• Help members of the Law Society to understand that if the law Society is not seen to be taking a role in facilitating access to justice, it will not be fulfilling its mandate under the Act.

Workshop #2:
The Regulator’s Role in Changing the Culture and Fostering Innovation

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Questions for Discussion</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>• How do our regulatory approaches currently promote or impede change and innovation?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• What regulatory innovations should be of priority in changing the culture?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• How do we protect the public interest while innovating to meet the demand and need for quicker, cheaper and less complicated services – what is necessary to regulate?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• What educational and regulatory trends and issues arising as a result of global, technological and other marketplace changes create opportunities to respond to access to justice needs?</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Discussion and Input:

• Establish a mandatory duty to provide pro bono legal services.
• Develop law school curricula for an access to justice course.
• Encourage law schools to educate students about access to justice.
• Review the scope of paralegal practice, especially in family law.
• Enumerate competencies required by a person who works in family law.
• Find ways to provide legal services in remote communities.
• Regulate and leverage the use of technology.
• Pick an area in most crisis, e.g. family law, and set a 5-year goal.
• Communicate more about referral function; legal information websites; unbundling; alternative legal service models.

Workshop #3
Breaking Silos- Ensuring a Collaborative Future – A Role for the Law Society in Ontario?

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Questions for Discussion</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>• How do we become better coordinated and collectively more efficient and effective?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• What structures or mechanisms are needed to ensure ongoing collaboration?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>• If the Law Society maintained a standing forum to facilitate collaboration, how should it operate?</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Discussion and Input:

• Enhance the Law Society’s role as a facilitator and coordinator.
• Be inclusive, but target groups per issue.
• Convene a roundtable to generate momentum. Include government and judiciary. Set the first agenda and let the process unfold organically. Create a new structure so the Law Society can fade into the background.
• Do something!

Workshop #4
Access to “Legal Services” – Early and Ongoing

Questions for Discussion
• What are “legal services” and how might they best be redefined, refocused or reorganized to allow more people to access the assistance they need, when they need it?
• Where is the line between legal advice and legal information and assistance appropriately drawn?
• Can we develop more precise parameters for the tasks that require the attention of a lawyer and those that could be completed by others?
• How do current regulations help or hinder in this area?

Discussion and Input:

Categories of legal providers
There are six categories of legal providers: (1) information providers; (2) navigators, tour guides and referrers; (3) triagers and issue identifiers; (4) form assisters; (5) front line community workers and social workers; (6) paralegals and lawyers.
• Reach out to the first five categories and to their regulars and educators.
• Provide information and clarity about the roles of all six categories.
• Enable all six categories to work together.
• Consider credentialing so that the public can be confident of unregulated providers.

Other
• Simplify forms and make them interactive.
• Educate “trusted intermediaries” (e.g., social workers, librarians, settlement workers) to provide legal information. Clarify the boundaries of information vs. advice.
• Provide on-site legal personnel at community sites (St. Mike’s model).
• Establish a mandatory pro bono requirement, with capacity to do it online.
• Lower fees by greater use of paralegals under a lawyer’s supervision.
• Designate which online legal information is reliable through a stamp of approval (“reviewed by law Society licensee”).

Workshop #5
How do we Measure Success?

Questions for Discussion
• Do we have a common vision of where we want to be or what success would look like in Ontario?
• How should success be measured and by whom?
• What approaches have others taken to measurement?
• What is missing that would better enable us to measure success or progress?
Discussion and Input:

- Pick one or two things the Law Society can do well – a few urgent projects – and measure their success. Define metrics after defining what the Law Society is trying to accomplish.
- Focus on the users, ordinary people.
- Reach out to marginalized communities and conduct research on their needs and perspectives.
- Establish quantitative and qualitative measures – we need both.
- There is no universal measure of access to justice. Measures should be context driven (e.g. very different in criminal and civil law). Engage the public and legal sectors in the dialogue.
- Convene more events like this and measure what comes out of them.
- Measure success at the local level.
- Measure confidence in the justice system, taking into account that people who lose their cases will be unsatisfied.
- Measure changes to the gap between people who need legal services and legal professionals who can provide service.

Wrap Up and Discussion of Next Steps

Remarks from Chief Justice Heather Smith, Superior Court of Justice

Chief Justice Smith indicated that this is an issue whose time has come. She referred to the National Action Committee report as a wonderful roadmap which serves as a clarion call for meaningful change by all justice sector components. She indicated that the Superior Court of Justice will try to implement the NAC recommendations that apply to it and to make each court event meaningful. She noted the importance of making a business case to government for pilot projects.

Treasurer’s Concluding Remarks

The Treasurer thanked all presenters, facilitators, participants and staff. He noted that while there are no easy answers, inaction is not an answer. He is committed to doing more to better fulfill the Law Society’s access to justice mandate. The Law Society is uniquely positioned to provide leadership – facilitative leadership – by establishing a standing forum for dialogue to help identify priorities, commit to specific actions, and facilitate collaboration. As a regulator, the Law Society also needs to examine its rules and regulations to ensure that they do not themselves constitute access to justice barriers. The next steps for the Law Society are to:

- Summarize the input from the Symposium and create a report.
- Formulate a detailed proposal for the Law Society’s role within a couple of months.
- Present the proposal to Convocation - a bold proposal that will help to move us from talk to action.

When we see things that work, we should support them and implement them.

--Chief Justice Smith, Superior Court of Justice

ACCESS TO CIVIL & FAMILY JUSTICE

A Roadmap for Change

October 2013
This report is published by the Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters, Ottawa, Canada, October 2013.

Comments on this report can be sent to the Action Committee through the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice, online at: <communications@cfjc-fcjc.org>.
It is a great pleasure and honour to acknowledge the tireless dedication and endless commitment of the members of the Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters by writing a foreword to this final report. As this report marks the conclusion of the first phase of the Action Committee’s work, allow me to reflect on how we arrived this far.

Let me start by saying that the problem of access to justice is not a new one. As long as justice has existed, there have been those who struggled to access it. But as Canadians celebrated the new millennium, it became clear that we were increasingly failing in our responsibility to provide a justice system that was accessible, responsive and citizen-focused. Reports told us that cost, delays, long trials, complex procedures and other barriers were making it impossible for more and more Canadians to exercise their legal rights.

Fortunately, governments, organizations, and many individuals responded to the plea for change. Across the country they embarked on initiatives aimed at improving access to justice. However, too often, these initiatives proceeded in isolation from one another. Despite much hard work, it became increasingly clear that what was required was a national discussion and a coordinated action strategy to access to justice. So, in 2006, the Action Committee was convened.

The Action Committee is composed of leaders in the civil and family justice community and a public representative, each representing a different part of the justice system. Its aim is to help all stakeholders in the justice system develop consensus priorities for civil and family justice reform and to encourage them to work together in a cooperative and collaborative way to improve access to justice.

The Action Committee identified four priority areas: access to legal services, court processes simplification, family law, and prevention, triage and referral. In each area, a working group was formed to look at specific ways of improving access to justice. Each working group has now issued its final report, identifying how accessible justice can be achieved, the tools that can assist people in dealing with their legal needs effectively and expeditiously, and changes to the system that will improve access to justice.

Under the leadership of the Honourable Thomas A. Cromwell and each working group’s chair, the working groups have produced reports that outline the concrete challenges and provide a rational, coherent and imaginative vision for meeting those challenges. They focus not only on good ideas, but on concrete actions to change the status quo. The Action Committee’s final report bridges the work of the four working groups and identifies a national roadmap for improving the ability of every Canadian to access the justice system.

Our task is far from complete. The next step is implementation – to put the Action Committee’s vision into action. But it is not amiss to celebrate what we have achieved thus far: a plan for practical and achievable actions that will improve access to family and civil justice across Canada. This could not have been accomplished without the contribution of all the individuals and organizations involved with the Action Committee. I thank you all for bringing accessible justice for all Canadians a significant step closer to reality.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

There is a serious access to justice problem in Canada. The civil and family justice system is too complex, too slow and too expensive. It is too often incapable of producing just outcomes that are proportional to the problems brought to it or reflective of the needs of the people it is meant to serve. While there are many dedicated people trying hard to make it work and there have been many reform efforts, the system continues to lack coherent leadership, institutional structures that can design and implement change, and appropriate coordination to ensure consistent and cost effective reform. Major change is needed.

This report has three purposes:

• to promote a broad understanding of what we mean by access to justice and of the access to justice problem facing our civil and family justice system;
• to identify and promote a new way of thinking — a culture shift — to guide our approach to reform; and
• to provide an access to justice roadmap for real improvement.

The report does not set out to provide detailed guidance on how to improve all aspects of the civil and family justice system across Canada’s ten provinces and three territories. That needs to come largely from the ground up, through strong mechanisms and institutions developed locally. Local service providers, justice system stakeholders and individual champions must be the change makers. This report can, however, help fill the need for a coordinated and collaborative national voice — a change agent — providing a multi-party justice system vision and an overall goal-based roadmap for change. The ways of the past — often working in silos and reinventing wheels — are not sustainable. A coordinated, although not centralized, national reform effort is needed. Innovative thinking at all levels will be critical for success.

When thinking about access to justice, the starting point and consistent focus of the Action Committee is on the broad range of legal problems experienced by the public — not just those that are adjudicated by courts. As we detail in part 1 of this report, there are clearly major access to justice gaps in Canada. For example:

• Nearly 12 million Canadians will experience at least 1 legal problem in a given 3 year period. Few will have the resources to solve them.
• Members of poor and vulnerable groups are particularly prone to legal problems. They experience more legal problems than higher income earners and more secure groups.
• People’s problems multiply; that is, having one kind of legal problem can often lead to other legal, social and health related problems.
• Finally, legal problems have social and economic costs. Unresolved legal problems adversely affect people’s lives and the public purse.

The current system, which is inaccessible to so many and unable to respond adequately to the problem, is unsustainable.

In part 2 of this report we offer six guiding principles for change, which amount to a shift in culture:

1. Put the Public First
2. Collaborate and Coordinate
3. Prevent and Educate
4. Simplify, Make Coherent, Proportional and Sustainable
5. Take Action
6. Focus on Outcomes

Taken together, these principles spell out the elements of an overriding culture of reform that is a precondition for developing specific measures of change and implementation.
Part 3 of this report provides a nine-point access to justice roadmap designed to bridge the implementation gap between ideas and action. It sets out three main areas for reform: (A) specific civil and family justice innovations, (B) institutions and structures, and (C) research and funding:

A. Innovation Goals

1. Refocus the Justice System to Reflect and Address Everyday Legal Problems

2. Make Essential Legal Services Available to Everyone

3. Make Courts and Tribunals Fully Accessible Multi-Service Centres for Public Dispute Resolution

4. Make Coordinated and Appropriate Multidisciplinary Family Services Easily Accessible

B. Institutional and Structural Goals

5. Create Local and National Access to Justice Implementation Mechanisms

6. Promote a Sustainable, Accessible and Integrated Justice Agenda through Legal Education

7. Enhance the Innovation Capacity of the Civil and Family Justice System

C. Research and Funding Goals

8. Support Access to Justice Research to Promote Evidence-Based Policy Making

9. Promote Coherent, Integrated and Sustained Funding Strategies

Access to justice is at a critical stage in Canada. What is needed is major, sustained and collaborative system-wide change — in the form of cultural and institutional innovation, research and funding-based reform. This report provides a multi-sector national plan for reform. The approach is to provide leadership through the promotion of concrete development goals. These are recommended goals, not dictates. Specific local conditions or problems call for locally tailored approaches and solutions.

Although we face serious access to justice challenges, there are many reasons to be optimistic about our ability to bridge the current implementation gap by pursuing concrete access to justice reforms. People within and beyond the civil and family justice system are increasingly engaged by access to justice challenges and many individuals and organizations are already working hard for change. We hope that the work of the Action Committee and in particular this report will lead to:

- a measurable and significant increase in civil and family access to justice within 5 years;
- a national access to justice policy framework that is widely accepted and adopted;
- local jurisdictions putting in place strategies and mechanisms for meaningful and sustainable change;
- a permanent national body being created and supported to promote, guide and monitor meaningful local and national access to justice initiatives;
- access to civil and family justice becoming a topic of general civic discussion and engagement — an issue of everyday individual and community interest and wellbeing; and
- the public being placed squarely at the centre of all meaningful civil and family justice education and reform efforts.
Today we take an important step on the road to improved access to civil and family justice in Canada. Through this report, the Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters makes the case that we must make changes urgently, that we must take a collaborative, cooperative and systemic approach and, above all else, that we must act in a sustained and focused way. We are building on firm foundations, but the structure urgently needs attention. The goal should be nothing less than to make our system of civil and family justice the most just and accessible in the world. As one speaker put it recently, we must think big together.

The Action Committee is a group broadly representative of all sectors of the civil and family justice system as well as of the public. Its report is the product of a stakeholder driven process and it is offered as a report back to all of the stakeholders in the civil and family justice system for their consideration and action. While the release of this report is the culmination of the work of the Action Committee, it is only the beginning of the process for reform. We must build the mechanisms that can instigate, manage and evaluate change in ways that are suitable to the widely varying needs and priorities of jurisdictions and regions. We must define specific problems, design solutions, and implement and monitor their success or failure. We must learn how to work together more effectively in the public interest.

I hope that this report will provide an impetus for meaningful change, some effective models to facilitate the sort of collaborative and cooperative work that I believe is essential and a menu of innovative ideas and possibilities for everyone working at the provincial, territorial and local levels. The real work begins now.

The members of the Action Committee, its Steering Committee and its four Working Groups have all worked tirelessly and as volunteers to make the Committee’s work possible. Working with these accomplished and committed people has been a highlight of my professional life. We were greatly assisted by the logistical support of the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice, the Canadian Judicial Council, the Justice Education Society of British Columbia and the Department of Justice for Canada where a dedicated group of people made up our highly efficient and effective secretariat without which we could not have completed our work.

We were also assisted by funding from Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, the Law Foundation of British Columbia and the Federation of Law Societies of Canada. Owen Rees, the Executive Legal Officer to the Chief Justice of Canada and my judicial assistant, Me Michelle Fournier have contributed far beyond the call of duty. Diana Lowe, Q.C., the founding Executive Director of the Forum was instrumental in the launch of the Action Committee. Professor Trevor Farrow of Osgoode Hall Law School and Chair of the Board of the Forum has played an invaluable role not only as an active member of the Action Committee but also as the one who held the pen during the preparation of this report.

Finally, I offer my thanks to Chief Justice McLachlin for having the vision to establish the Action Committee and for providing me with the opportunity to be part of it.

PART 1

Access to Civil and Family Justice:
Urgent Need for Change

OVERVIEW
There is a serious access to justice problem in Canada.
The civil and family justice system is too complex, too slow and too expensive. It is too often incapable of producing just outcomes that are proportional to the problems brought to it or reflective of the needs of the people it is meant to serve. While there are many dedicated people trying hard to make it work and there have been many reform efforts, the system continues to lack coherent leadership, institutional structures that can design and implement change, and appropriate coordination to ensure consistent and cost effective reform. Major change is needed.

PURPOSE
This report has three purposes:
1. To promote a broad understanding of what we mean by access to justice and of the access to justice problem facing our civil and family justice system;
2. To identify and promote a new way of thinking — a culture shift — to guide our approach to reform; and
3. To provide an access to justice roadmap for real improvement. The report does not set out to provide detailed, line-item guidance on how to improve all aspects of the civil and family justice system across Canada's ten provinces and three territories. That needs to come largely from the ground up, through strong mechanisms and institutions developed locally. Local service providers, justice system stakeholders and individual champions must be the change makers. This report can, however, help fill the need for a coordinated and collaborative national voice — a change agent — providing a multi-party justice system vision and an overall goal-based roadmap for change. The ways of the past — often working in silos and reinventing wheels — are not sustainable. A coordinated, although not centralized, national reform effort is needed. Put simply, we should "think systemically and act locally." Innovative thinking at all levels will be critical for success.
ACCESS TO JUSTICE: AN EXPANSIVE VISION
When thinking about access to justice, the starting point and consistent focus of the Action Committee is on the broad range of legal problems experienced by the public — not just those that are adjudicated by courts. Key to this understanding of the justice system is that it looks at everyday legal problems from the point of view of the people experiencing them. Historically, access to justice has been a concept that centered on the formal justice system (courts, tribunals, lawyers and judges) and its procedures. The formal system is, of course, important. But a more expansive, user-centered vision of an accessible civil and family justice system is required. We need a system that provides the necessary institutions, knowledge, resources and services to avoid, manage and resolve civil and family legal problems and disputes. That system must be able to do so in ways that are as timely, efficient, effective, proportional and just as possible:
• by preventing disputes and by early management of legal issues;
• through negotiation and informal dispute resolution services; and
• where necessary, through formal dispute resolution by tribunals and courts.

Important elements of this vision include:
• public awareness of rights, entitlements, obligations and responsibilities;
• public awareness of ways to avoid or prevent legal problems;
• ability to participate effectively in negotiations to achieve a just outcome;
• ability to effectively utilize non-court and court dispute resolution procedures;
• and
• institutions and mechanisms designed to implement accessible civil and family justice reforms.

CURRENT GAPS IN ACCESS TO JUSTICE — THE PROBLEM
1. Everyday Legal Problems
Civil justice problems are "pervasive in the lives of Canadians" and frequently have negative impacts on them. Nearly 12 million Canadians will experience at least 1 legal problem in a given 3 year period. In the area of family law alone, annual averages indicate that approximately 40% of marriages will end in divorce. These are the problems of everyday people in everyday life.

• Many People Have Everyday Legal Problems. Nearly 12 million Canadians will experience at least 1 legal problem in a given 3 year period. In the area of family law alone, annual averages indicate that approximately 40% of marriages will end in divorce. These are the problems of everyday people in everyday life.

• The Poor and the Vulnerable are Particularly Prone to Legal Problems. Individuals with lower incomes and members of vulnerable groups experience more legal problems than higher income earners and members of more secure groups. For example, people who self-identify as disabled are more than 4 times more likely to experience social assistance problems and 3 times more likely to experience housing related problems, and people who self-identify as aboriginal are nearly 4 times more likely to experience social assistance problems.
• Problems Multiply. One kind of legal problem (for example, domestic violence) often leads to, or is aggravated by, others (such as relationship breakdown, child education issues, etc.). Legal problems also have momentum: the more legal problems an individual experiences, the greater the likelihood that she or he will experience others. Legal problems also tend to lead to other problems of other types. For example, almost 40% of people with one or more legal problems reported having other social or health related problems that they directly attributed to a justiciable problem.

• Legal Problems Have Social and Economic Costs. Unresolved legal problems adversely affect people's lives, their finances and the public purse. They of course tend to make people's lives difficult. Unresolved problems relating (for example) to debt, housing, and social services lead to social exclusion, which may in turn lead to a dependency on government assistance. One recent U.K. study reported that unresolved legal problems cost individuals and the public £13 billion over a 3.5 year period.

2. Importance Of Accessible Justice
   To address these problems, we need a stronger and more effective civil and family justice system that is viewed and experienced as such by the public. This is critically important for the daily lives of people and for the social, political and economic well-being of society. For the system to be strong and effective, people must have meaningful access to it.

3. The Current System Has Serious Gaps In Access
   According to a wide range of justice system indicators and stakeholders, Canada is facing major access to justice challenges. For example, in the area of access to civil justice Canada ranked 13th out of 29 high-income countries in 2012-2013 and 16th out of 23 high-income countries in 2011. According to the 2011 study, Canada's ranking was "partially explained by shortcomings in the affordability of legal advice and representation, and the lengthy duration of civil cases."

   These international indicators tell us two things. First, Canada has a functioning justice system that is well regarded by many countries in the world. Second, improvement is urgently needed. There is a major gap between what legal services cost and what the vast majority of Canadians can afford. Some cost indicators are:

• Legal Aid Funding and Coverage Is Not Available for Most People and Problems.
   Legal aid funding is available only for those of extremely modest means. For example in Ontario, legal aid funding is generally only available for individuals with a gross annual salary of less than $40,000, or for a family of 4 with a total gross annual salary of $70,000. In Alberta, legal aid funding is generally only available for individuals with a net annual salary of approximately $16,000, or for a family of 4 with a total net annual salary of approximately $30,000. In Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the eligibility levels for individuals and families of 4 are, respectively, gross annual salaries of $14,000 and $27,000 and net annual salaries of $11,800 and $22,800. Even within these financial eligibility ranges, legal aid covers only a limited number of areas of legal services. For example, in Ontario, but for some civil matters covered by community, specialty and student clinics, legal aid coverage for civil matters does not exist.

- The Cost of Legal Services and Length of Proceedings Is Increasing. Legal fees in Canada vary significantly; however, one recent report provides a rough range of national average hourly rates from approximately $195 (for lawyers called in 2012) to $380 (for lawyers called in 1992 and earlier). Rates can vary from this range significantly depending on jurisdiction, type of case, seniority and experience. The cost of civil and family matters also varies significantly. For example, national ranges of legal fees are recently reported to be $13,561 - $37,229 for a civil action up to trial (2 days), $23,083 - $79,750 for a civil action up to trial (5 days), $38,296 - $124,574 for a civil action up to trial (7 days), and $12,533 - $36,750 for a civil action appeal. The length and cost of legal matters have continued to increase.

4. Unmet Legal Needs
Most people earn too much money to qualify for legal aid, but too little to afford the legal services necessary to meaningfully address any significant legal problem. The system is essentially inaccessible for all of these people. Below are some of the indicators.

- Unmet Legal Needs. According to one recent American study, as much as 70%–90% of legal needs in society go unmet. This statistic is particularly troubling given what we know about the negative impacts of justiciable problems, particularly those that go unresolved. In Canada, over 20% of the population take no meaningful action with respect to their legal problems, and over 65% think that nothing can be done, are uncertain about their rights, do not know what to do, think it will take too much time, cost too much money or are simply afraid.

- Cost Is a Major Factor. Of those who do not seek legal assistance, recent reports indicate that between 42% and 90% identified cost — or at least perceived cost — as the reason for not doing so. An important result of the inaccessibility of legal services and the fact that many people do nothing to address their legal problems is that a proportion of legal problems that could be resolved relatively easily at an earlier stage escalate and shift to ones that require expensive legal services and court time down the road.

- Self-Representation. As a result of the inaccessibility of early assistance, legal services and dispute resolution assistance, as well as the complexity and length of formal procedures, approximately 50% of people try to solve their problems on their own with no or minimal legal or authoritative non-legal assistance. Many people — often well over 50% (depending on the court and jurisdiction) — represent themselves in judicial proceedings (usually not by choice). The number is equally — and often more — significant and troubling in family court proceedings. And statistics indicate that individuals who receive legal assistance are between 17% and 1,380% more likely to receive better results than those who do not.
What is needed is major, sustained and collaborative system-wide change — in the form of cultural and institutional innovation, research and funding-based reform.

Not surprisingly, people's attitudes towards the system reflect this reality. According to a recent study of self-represented litigants in the Canadian court system, various court workers were of the view that the "civil system [...] very much open to abuse by those with more money at their disposal"; and the "general public has no idea about court procedures, requirements, the language, who or where to go for help." 40

Further, according to a recent study, people expressed similar concerns about access to justice, including the following:

- "I don't have much faith in the lawyers and the system";
- the "language of justice tends to be ... foreign to most people";
- "[p]eople with money have access to more justice than people without";
- I think there are a lot of people who don't ... understand what the justice system is or how to use it — struggling to earn a living, dealing with addictions..."; and
- the justice system "should be equally important as our health care system..." 41

5. What Is Needed?

There are clearly major access to justice gaps in Canada.42 The current system, which is inaccessible to so many and unable to respond adequately to the problem, is unsustainable.43 Two things are urgently needed.

- First, a new way of thinking — a culture shift — is required to move away from old patterns and old approaches. We offer six guiding principles for change reflecting this culture shift in part 2 of this report.

- Second, a specific action plan — a goal-oriented access to justice roadmap — is urgently needed. That roadmap, which is set out in part 3 of this report, proposes goals relating to innovation, institutions and structures, and research and funding.

Taken together, what is needed is major, sustained and collaborative system-wide change — in the form of cultural and institutional innovation, research and funding-based reform.
PART 2

Moving Forward:
Six Guiding Principles for Change

CULTURE SHIFT
Many dedicated people in our civil and family justice system do their best to make the system work and many reform efforts have been put forward in past years. However, it is now clear that the previous approach to access to justice problems and solutions, far from succeeding, has produced our present, unsustainable situation.

We need a fresh approach and a new way of thinking. In short, we need a significant shift in culture to achieve meaningful improvement to access to justice in Canada—a new culture of reform. As Lawrence M. Friedman observed, “law reform is doomed to failure if it does not take legal culture into account.”

This new culture of reform should be based on six guiding principles. Taken together, these principles spell out the elements of an overriding culture of reform. A new way of thinking, while important, is not enough. We also need innovative ideas, creative solutions and specific goals, as we set out in part 3. A full embrace of a new culture of reform is a precondition for developing those more specific measures.

SIX GUIDING PRINCIPLES FOR CHANGE
Here are six guiding principles that make up this new culture.

Guiding Principles For Change
1. Put the Public First
2. Collaborate and Coordinate
3. Prevent and Educate
4. Simplify; Make Coherent, Proportional and Sustainable
5. Take Action
6. Focus on Outcomes
1. Put the Public First

We need to change our primary focus. Too often, we focus inward on how the system operates from the point of view of those who work in it. For example, court processes—language, location, operating times, administrative systems, paper and filing requirements, etc.—typically make sense and work for lawyers, judges and court staff. They often do not make sense or do not work for litigants.

The focus must be on the people who need to use the system. This focus must include all people, especially members of immigrant, aboriginal and rural populations and other vulnerable groups. Litigants, and particularly self-represented litigants, are not, as they are too often seen, an inconvenience; they are why the system exists.46

Until we involve those who use the system in the reform process, the system will not really work for those who use it. As one court administrator recently commented, we need to “change ... how we do business within the context of courts.”47 Those of us working within the system need to remember that it exists to serve the public. That must be the focus of all reform efforts.

2. Collaborate and Coordinate

We also need to focus on collaboration and coordination. The administration of justice in Canada is fragmented. In fact, it is hard to say that there is a system—as opposed to many systems and parts of systems. Justice services are delivered at various levels in this country—national, provincial and territorial, and often regional, local and sectoral as well.48

Within our current constitutional, administrative and sectoral frameworks, much more collaboration and coordination is not only needed but achievable. We can and must improve collaboration and coordination not only across and within jurisdictions, but also across and within all sectors and aspects of the justice system (civil, family, early dispute resolution, courts, tribunals, the Bar, the Bench, court administration, the academy, the public, etc.). We can and must improve collaboration, coordination and service integration with other social service sectors and providers as well.

We are long past the time for reinventing wheels. We can no longer afford to ignore what is going on in different regions and sectors and miss opportunities for sharing and collaboration.49 Openness, proactivity, collaboration and coordination must animate how we approach improving access to justice at all levels and across all sectors of the system.50 In sum, we all—those who use the justice system and those who work within the justice community—are in this project together. A just society is in all of our interest.

3. Prevent and Educate

We need to focus not only on resolving disputes but on preventing them as well. Access to justice has often been thought of as access to courts and lawyers.51 However, we know that everyday legal problems mostly occur outside of formal justice structures.52 This insight should lead us to fundamentally re-think how we approach legal problems in terms of preventing them from happening where possible, and when they do occur, providing those who experience them with adequate
To make a meaningful difference in the lives of the people who rely on the justice system, we need to move beyond “wise words” and bridge the “implementation gap.”

information and resources to deal with them in an efficient and effective way. As the Action Committee’s Prevention, Triage and Referral Working Group indicated, “Avoiding problems or the escalation of problems, and/or early resolution of problems is generally cheaper and less disruptive than resolution using the courts. To borrow Richard Susskind’s observation, ‘It is much less expensive to build a fence at the top of a cliff than to have need of an expensive ambulance at the bottom.’”

4. Simplify, Make Coherent, Proportional and Sustainable

We must work to make things simple, coherent, proportional and sustainable. One aspect of this task, building on the “public first” principle set out above, is the public’s understanding of the system. The Canadian Bar Association acknowledged the system’s complexity in its 1996 Systems of Civil Justice Task Force Report:

“Many aspects of the civil justice system are difficult to understand for those untrained in the law. Without assistance it is difficult, if not impossible, to gain access to a system one does not comprehend. Barriers to understanding include:

- unavailability and inaccessibility of legal information;
- complexity of the law, its vocabulary, procedures and institutions; and
- linguistic, cultural and communication barriers.”

In spite of recent efforts, the civil and family justice system is still too complicated and largely incomprehensible to all but those with legal training. As one participant in a recent access to justice survey of the public put it, we need to “make the whole thing much less complex.” Similarly, in a recent study of self-represented litigants, respondents regularly indicated feeling overwhelmed by the complexity of the system. One respondent indicated that the “procedure as I read it sounded easy ... but it was anything but.” Another indicated that, as a result of the system’s many procedural steps, “I was eaten alive.”

Our current formal procedures seem to grow ever more complicated and disproportional to the needs of the litigants and the matters involved. Everyday legal problems need everyday solutions that are timely, fair and cost-effective. Procedures must be simple and proportional for the entire system to be sustainable. To improve the system, we need a new way of thinking that concentrates on simplicity, coherence, proportionality and sustainability at every stage of the process.

5. Take Action

We need research, thinking and deliberation. But for meaningful change to occur, they are not enough. We also need action. We cannot put off, to another day, formulating and carrying out a specific and effective action plan. There have been many reports and reform initiatives, but the concrete results have been extremely modest. As the Family Justice Working Group indicated, to make a meaningful difference in the lives of the people who rely on the justice system, we need to move beyond “wise words” and bridge the “implementation gap.”
6. Focus On Outcomes

Our final guiding principle calls for a shift in focus from process to outcomes. We must be sure our process is just. But we must not just focus on process. We should not be preoccupied with fair processes for their own sake, but with achieving fair and just results for those who use the system. Of course fair process is important. But at the end of the day, what people want most is a safe, healthy and productive life for themselves, their children and their loved ones. In a recent survey of public views about justice, one respondent defined justice as “access to society.” According to another respondent: “We're not even talking access to justice ... we're talking access to food, to shelter, to security, to opportunities for ourselves and our kids and until we deal with that, the other stuff doesn't make sense.”

In order to make justice more accessible, we must keep in mind that we are trying to improve law and process not for their own sake, but rather for the sake of providing and improving justice in the lives of Canadians. Providing justice — not just in the form of fair and just process but also in the form of fair and just outcomes — must be our primary concern.
PART 3

Bridging the Implementation Gap Through Justice Development Goals:
A Nine-Point Access To Justice Roadmap

The third part of this report sets out an access to justice roadmap, designed to bridge the implementation gap between reform ideas and real reform. It sets out three main areas for reform: (A) specific innovations, (B) institutions and structures, and (C) research and funding. Within each, we offer specific justice development goals. Each of the goals has been significantly influenced by the Action Committee’s working group reports.3 This part of the report lays out an overall approach to respond to the serious access to justice problems facing the public within our civil and family justice system.

Access to Justice Roadmap

A. INNOVATION GOALS
   1. Refocus the Justice System to Reflect and Address Everyday Legal Problems
   2. Make Essential Legal Services Available to Everyone
   3. Make Courts and Tribunals Fully Accessible Multi-Service Centres for Public Dispute Resolution
   4. Make Coordinated and Appropriate Multidisciplinary Family Services Easily Accessible

B. INSTITUTIONAL AND STRUCTURAL GOALS
   5. Create Local and National Access to Justice Implementation Mechanisms
   6. Promote a Sustainable, Accessible and Integrated Justice Agenda through Legal Education
   7. Enhance the Innovation Capacity of the Civil and Family Justice System

C. RESEARCH AND FUNDING GOALS
   8. Support Access to Justice Research to Promote Evidence-Based Policy Making
   9. Promote Coherent, Integrated and Sustained Funding Strategies
A. INNOVATION GOALS

1. Refocus the Justice System to Reflect and Address Everyday Legal Problems
   - By 2018

1.1 Widen the Focus from Dispute Resolution to Education and Prevention
As we saw earlier in part 1, people experience and deal with most everyday legal problems outside of the traditional formal justice system; or put differently, only a small portion of legal problems—approximately 6.5%—ever reach the formal justice system.

The justice system must acknowledge this reality by widening its focus from its current (and expensive) court-based "emergency room" orientation to include education and dispute prevention. As one member of the public recently commented, it would be helpful if "a little more money can be spent on education ... to prevent heading to jail or court, to prevent it before it starts..." This shift in focus is designed to help the most people in the most efficient, effective and just way at the earliest point in the process.

To achieve this shift, the justice system must be significantly enhanced so that it provides a flexible continuum of justice services, which includes court services of course, but which is not dominated by those more expensive services (see Figs. 1 and 2). The motto might be: "court if necessary, but not necessarily court."

1.2 Build a Robust "Front End": Early Resolution Services Sector
A key element of this expanded continuum of services is a robust, coherent and coordinated "front end" (prior to more formal court and tribunal related services), which is referred to by the Action Committee as the Early Resolution Services Sector (ERSS). It is the ERSS that will provide accessible justice services at a time and place at which most everyday legal problems occur (see Fig. 1).

Figure 1: Involvement of the ERSS and the Formal Justice System in the Overall Volume of Legal Problems
The ERSS is made up of services such as:

- community and public legal education;
- triage (i.e., effective channeling of people to needed services);
- pro bono services;
- other in-person, telephone, and e-referral services;
- intermediary referral assistance (help in recognizing legal problems and connecting them with legal and other services);
- telephone and e-legal information services;
- legal publications programs and in-person and e-law library services;
- dispute resolution programs (e.g., family mediation and conciliation services, small claims mediation, lower cost civil mediation, etc.);
- various legal aid services, including legal clinics, certificate programs, duty counsel, etc.;
- community justice hubs;
- co-location of services;
- student support services including clinical services, student mediation initiatives, public interest programs, etc.; and
- others.

Part 3: Bridging the Implementation Gap Through Justice Development Goals
Collectively, the ERSS is designed to provide resources that:

- assist people in clarifying the nature of law and problems that have a legal component;
- help people to develop their legal capacity to manage conflicts, resolve problems earlier by themselves and/or seek early and appropriate assistance;
- promote early understanding and resolution of legal problems outside the court system through alternative dispute resolution mechanisms and/or directly by parties themselves;
- assist people in navigating the court system efficiently and effectively; and
- provide effective referrals.

Given the breadth of services available as part of the ERSS, it is critical that:

- the ERSS be developed in a coordinated, deliberate and collaborative way (in the context of all justice services) in order to avoid the kinds of overlap, gaps and inefficiencies that currently exist;
- means be established by all those active in this sector and all those providing funding to engage in action-oriented consultation to define and rationalize this sector;
- adequate training for ERSS personnel be provided, including training on how to coordinate services across the ERSS; and
- the ERSS be integrated into the formal justice system as part of an expanded justice system continuum, coordinated as far as possible with the provision of other services, including social services, health services, education, etc., all with a view to meeting complex and often clustered everyday legal needs.

Coordination and communication will be critical for this further integration to take place. Examples of this kind of coordination include community hubs, coordinated community service centres, etc.

1.3 Improve Accessibility to and Coordination of Public Legal Information

Providing access to legal information is an important aspect of the ERSS. The good news is that there is an enormous amount of publicly available legal information in Canada and that there are active and creative information providers. But there are significant challenges. It is not always clear to the user what information is authoritative, current or reliable. There is work to be done to improve the accessibility and in some cases the quality of these resources. The biggest challenge, however, is the lack of integration and coordination among information providers. A much greater degree of coordination and integration is required to avoid duplication of effort and to provide clear paths for the public to reliable information. This could be achieved through enhanced coordination and cooperation among providers, the development of regional, sector or national information portals, authoritative online information hubs, virtual self-help information services, certification protocols, a complaints process, etc.

1.4 Justice Continuum Must Be Reflective of the Population it Serves

Services within the justice continuum must reflect and be responsive to Canada's culturally and geographically diverse population. We need to focus on the needs of marginalized groups and communities and to recognize that there are many barriers to accessing the formal and informal systems — language, financial status, mental health capacity, geographical remoteness, gender, class, religion, sexual orientation, immigration status, culture and aboriginal status. We need to identify these barriers to access to justice and take steps to eliminate them.

2. Make Essential Legal Services Available to Everyone – By 2018

2.1 Modernize and Expand the Legal Services Sector

Many everyday problems require legal services from legal professionals. For many, those services are not accessible. Innovations are needed in the way we provide essential legal services in order to make them available to everyone. The profession including the Canadian Bar Association, the Federation of Law Societies of Canada, law societies, regional and other lawyer associations — will, together with the national and local access to justice organizations discussed below (see pt.3.B.5), take a leadership role in this important innovation process.

Specific innovations and improvements that should be considered and potentially developed include:

- limited scope retainers – “unbundling”;
- alternative business and delivery models;
- increased opportunities for paralegal services;
- increased legal information services by lawyers and qualified non-lawyers;
- appropriate outsourcing of legal services;
- summary advice and referrals;
- alternative billing models;
- legal expense insurance and broad-based legal care;
- pro bono and low bono services;
- creative partnerships and initiatives designed to encourage expanding access to legal services - particularly to low income clients;
- programs to promote justice services to rural and remote communities as well as marginalized and equity seeking communities; and
- programs that match unmet legal needs with unmet legal markets.

2.2 Increase Legal Aid Services and Funding

Legal services provided by lawyers, paralegals and other trained legal service providers are vital to assuring access to justice in all sectors, particularly for low and moderate income communities and other rural, remote and marginalized groups in society. To assist with the provision of these services for civil and family legal problems, it is essential that the availability of legal aid services for civil and family legal problems be increased.
2.3 Make Access to Justice a Central Aspect of Professionalism

Access to justice⁹⁸ must become more than a vague and aspirational principle. Law societies and lawyers must see it as part of a modern — "sustainable"⁹⁹ — notion of legal professionalism.¹⁰⁰ Access to justice should feature prominently in law school curricula, bar admission and continuing education programs, codes of conduct, etc.¹⁰¹ Mentoring will be important to sustained success. Serving the public — in the form of concrete and measurable outcomes — should be an increasingly central feature of professionalism.¹⁰²

3. Make Courts And Tribunals Fully Accessible Multi-Service Centres for Public Dispute Resolution — By 2019¹⁰³

3.1 Courts and Tribunals Must Be Accessible to and Reflective of the Society they Serve¹⁰⁴

The Canadian justice system is currently served by excellent lawyers, judges, courts and tribunals. The problem is not their quality, but rather their accessibility. While many of the goals and recommendations considered elsewhere in this report focus on the parts of the justice system that lie outside of formal dispute resolution processes (see e.g. Fig. 1), there is still a central role for robust and accessible public dispute resolution venues. Justice — including a robust court and tribunal system — is very much a central part of any access to justice discussion. However, to make courts and tribunals more accessible to more people and more cases, they must be significantly reformed with the user centrally in mind.¹⁰⁵

While maintaining their constitutional and administrative importance in the context of a democracy governed by the rule of law, courts and tribunals must become much more accessible to and reflective of the needs of the society they serve. Put simply, just, creative and proportional processes should be available for all legal problems that need dispute resolution assistance. We recognize that much has been done. We also recognize that much more can be done. Further, the resources and support that are needed for initiatives discussed elsewhere in this report should not come at the expense of service to the public and respect for other important and ongoing initiatives that are working to improve access to justice in courts and tribunals.

3.2 Courts and Tribunals Should Become Multi-Service Dispute Resolution Centres

In the spirit of the “multi-door courthouse”,¹⁰⁶ a range of dispute resolution services — negotiation, conciliation and mediation, judicial dispute resolution, mini-trials, etc., as well as motions, applications, full trials, hearings and appeals — should be offered within most courts and tribunals.¹⁰⁷ Some form of court-annexed dispute resolution process — mediation, judicial dispute resolution, etc. — should be more readily available in virtually all cases. While masters, judges and panel members will do some of this work, some of it can also be offered by trained court staff, duty counsel, dispute resolution officers, court-based mediators and others.¹⁰⁸

Building on the current administrative law model, specialized court services — e.g. mental health courts, municipal courts,¹⁰⁹ commercial lists, expanded and accessible small claims and consumer courts, etc. — should be offered within the court or tribunal structure.

Part 3: Bridging the Implementation Gap Through Justice Development Goals
Online dispute resolution options, including court and non-court-based online dispute resolution services, should also be expanded where possible and appropriate, particularly for small claims matters,\textsuperscript{49} debt and consumer issues,\textsuperscript{50} property assessment appeals\textsuperscript{19} and others. As Lord Neuberger, President of the U.K. Supreme Court recently stated, "We may well have something to learn from online dispute resolution on eBay and elsewhere."\textsuperscript{94}

3.3 Court and Tribunal Services Must Provide Appropriate Services for Self-Represented Litigants

Appropriate and accessible processes must be readily available for litigants who represent themselves on their own, or with limited scope retainers. All who work in the formal dispute resolution system must be properly trained to assist litigants in ways that meet their dispute resolution needs to the extent that it is reasonably possible to do so.\textsuperscript{99} To achieve this goal, courts and tribunals must be coordinated and integrated with the ERSS information and service providers (some of which may be located within courts and tribunal buildings).\textsuperscript{100} Law and family law information centres should be expanded and integrated with all court services.\textsuperscript{107} Civil and family duty counsel and pro bono programs (including lawyers and students) should also be expanded.\textsuperscript{109}

3.4 Case Management Should Be Promoted and Available in All Appropriate Cases

Timely — often early — judicial case management should be readily available. In addition, where necessary, case management officers, who may be lawyers, duty counsel, or other appropriately trained people, should be readily available at all courts and tribunals for all cases, with the authority to assist parties to manage their cases and to help resolve their disputes.\textsuperscript{109}

Parties should be encouraged to agree on common experts; to use simplified notices; to plead orally where appropriate (to reduce the cost and time of preparing legal materials); and, generally, to talk to one another about solving problems in a timely and cost-effective manner.\textsuperscript{109} Judges and tribunal members should not hesitate to use their powers to limit the number of issues to be tried and the number of witnesses to be examined. Scheduling procedures should also be put into place to allow for fast-track trials where possible.

Overall, judges, tribunal members, masters, registrars and all other such court officers should take a strong leadership role in promoting a culture shift toward high efficiency, proportionality and effectiveness through the management of cases. Of course, justice according to law must always be the ultimate guide by which to evaluate the efficiency and effectiveness of judicial and tribunal processes.

3.5 Court and Tribunal Processes and Procedures Must Be More Accessible and User-Friendly

The guiding principles in part 2 of the report — specifically including (pt.2.1) putting the public first, (pt.2.4) simplification, coherence, proportionality and sustainability, and (pt.2.6) a focus on outcomes — must animate court and tribunal innovations and reforms. The technology in all courts and tribunals must be modernized to a level that reflects the electronic needs, abilities and expectations of a modern society. Interactive court forms should be widely accessible. Scheduling, e-filing\textsuperscript{109} and docket management should all be simplified and made easily accessible and all court and tribunal documents must be accessible electronically (both on site and remotely). Courts and tribunals should be encouraged to develop the ability to generate real time court orders. Courthouse electronic systems should be integrated with other ERSS electronic and self-help services.

Teleconferencing, videoconferencing and internet-based conferencing (e.g. Skype) should be widely available for all appearance types, including case management, status hearings, motions, applications, judicial dispute resolution proceedings, mediation, trials and appeals, etc.

Better public communication, including through the use of social and other media, should be encouraged to demystify the court and tribunal process. Overall, and in all cases, rules and processes should be simplified to promote and balance the principles of proportionality, simplification, efficiency, fairness and justice.

3.6 Judicial Independence and Ethical Responsibilities
The innovations advanced in this report do not and must not undermine the importance of judicial independence or the ethical standards that judges strive to meet. Rather, they must complement and reinforce these important principles.

4. Make Coordinated and Appropriate Multidisciplinary Family Services Easily Accessible – By 2018
Major change is urgently needed in the family justice system. The Family Justice Working Group Report sets out a comprehensive list of suggested reforms. That report is readily accessible and it is not necessary to reproduce all of its recommendations here. Instead we set out some of the main themes.

4.1 Progressive Values Must Guide All Family Justice Services
The core values, aims and principles that should guide all family justice reforms include: conflict minimization; collaboration; client-focus; empowered families; integration of multidisciplinary services; timely resolution; affordability; voice, fairness, safety; and proportionality.

4.2 A Range of Family Services Must be Provided
A range of accessible and affordable services and options — in the form of a family justice services continuum — must be available and affordable for all family law problems (see Fig. 3). The family justice services system should offer an array of dispute resolution options to help families resolve their disputes, including information, mediation, collaborative law, parenting coordination, and adjudication.

Early “front end” services in the family justice services system should be expanded. Specifically, this means allocating resources so as to make front-end services highly visible, easy to access and user-friendly; coordinating and integrating the delivery of all services for separating families; and making triage services (i.e. effective channeling of people to required services), including assessment, information and referral, available for all people with family law problems.
4.3 Consensual Approaches to Dispute Resolution Should Be Integrated as Far as Possible into the Family Justice System

We need to expand significantly the availability of integrated family programs and services to support the proactive management of family law-related problems and to facilitate early, consensual family dispute resolution and to support a broader and deeper integration of consensual values and problem-solving approaches into the justice system culture.35

4.4 Innovation Across the Family Justice System Must Be Encouraged35

A number of specific family justice innovations are suggested below:

- Law society regulation of family lawyers should explicitly address and support the non-traditional knowledge, skills, abilities, traits and attitudes required by lawyers optimally to manage family law files.35
- Ministries of Justice, Bar associations, law schools, mediators, collaborative practitioners, PLEI providers and — to the extent appropriate — the judiciary, should contribute to and advocate for enhanced public education and understanding about the nature of collaborative values and the availability of consensual dispute resolution (CDR) procedures in the family justice system.
- Before filing a contested application in a family matter (but after filing initial pleadings), parties should be required to participate in a single non-judicial CDR session. Rules should indicate the types of processes that are included and ensure they are delivered by qualified professionals. Exemptions should be available...
Free or subsidized CDR services should be available to those who cannot afford them.

where the parties have already participated in CDR, for cases involving family violence, or where it is otherwise urgent for one or both parties to appear before the court. Free or subsidized CDR services should be available to those who cannot afford them.

- Except in cases of urgency and consent orders, information sessions should be mandatory for self-represented litigants and all parents with dependent children. The sessions should take place as early as possible and before parties can appear in court. At a minimum, the following information should be provided: how to parent after separation and the effects of conflict on children; basic legal information; information about mediation and other procedural options; and information about available non-legal family services.

- Jurisdictions should expand reliance upon properly trained and supervised paralegals, law students, articling students and non-lawyer experts to provide a range of services to families with legal problems.

4.5 Courts Should Be Restructured to Better Handle Family Law Issues
Recognizing that each jurisdiction would have its own version of the unified court model, to meet the needs of families and children, jurisdictions should consider whether implementation of a unified family court would be desirable.

A unified family court should retain the benefits of provincial family courts, including their distinctive and simplified procedures, and should have its own simplified rules, forms and dispute resolution processes that are attuned to the distinctive needs and limited means of family law participants. The judges presiding over proceedings in the court should be specialized. They should have or be willing to acquire substantive and procedural expertise in family law; the ability to bring strong dispute resolution skills to bear on family cases; training in and sensitivity to the psychological and social dimensions of family law cases (in particular, family violence and the impact of separation and divorce on children); and an awareness of the range of family justice services available to the families appearing before them.

Jurisdictions that do not consider implementation of a unified family court to be desirable or feasible should take into consideration the hallmarks of unified family courts as set out above and strive to provide them at a greater degree where possible.

Family courts should adopt simplified procedures for smaller or more limited family law disputes. The same judge should preside over all pre-trial motions, conferences and hearings in family cases.

4.6 Substantive Family Law Should Be Modernized to Reflect More Consensual and Supportive Approaches to Dispute Resolution
Canadian family law statutes should encourage CDR processes as the norm in family law, and the language of substantive law should be revised to reflect that orientation. Substantive family laws should provide more support for early and complete disclosure by providing for positive obligations to govern all stages of a case as well as serious consequences for failure to comply. Overall, substantive family laws should be simpler and offer more guidance by way of rules, guidelines and presumptions.
B. INSTITUTIONAL AND STRUCTURAL GOALS

5. Create Local and National Access to Justice Implementation Mechanisms – By 2016

5.1 Create and Support Coordinated Local Access to Justice Implementation Commissions (AJICs)

No one department or agency has sole responsibility for the delivery of justice in Canada. That, in our view, is a core reason for why the improvement of access to justice continues to be such a challenge. For coherent, collaborative and coordinated change to occur, mechanisms need to be available in all provinces and territories. Where such collaborative mechanisms already exist, they need to be supported and perhaps reformed where necessary. Where they do not already exist, they need to be created and supported. While each region will have to identify or design a structure to suit its own particular needs, some structure or institution is needed to promote, design and implement change on a sustained and ongoing basis. Where new financial or other support is required, it should not come at the expense of service to the public and respect for local organizations and providers. After all, it will be these local organizations, along with others, who will have the important ideas for moving forward together.

In order to provide some assistance in terms of what these mechanisms might look like, particularly in jurisdictions in which such mechanisms do not already exist or are not adequately developed and supported, we set out here an example of the kind of mechanism and approach we have in mind. For the purpose of this report, we call these mechanisms local standing access to justice implementation commissions (AJICs).

5.2 Broad-Based Membership

The membership of AJICs should be broadly based, with judicial and court administration participation, combined with multi-stakeholder collaboration, through top down and bottom up coherent, collaborative and consultative approaches. The public – through various representative organizations – should play a central role.

The kinds of individuals and organizations that should be part of these committees include the member organizations of the Action Committee, as well as other relevant stakeholder groups and individuals.

Members from the justice sector must be directly linked at a leadership level with their organizations and must commit for a minimum of three years. In addition to volunteer individual members, AJICs need to have administrative staff and support. The modest support needed for AJICs should come from stakeholders. The AJICs must consist of leaders who are champions of change who will form strong guiding coalitions for change.

There are innovative and efficient ways of bringing these sorts of mechanisms together. Local centres, in-person meetings, electronic and distance participation, and other accessible methods – including the use of social media, streaming, blogging, and other broad-based and participatory tools – should be considered. These tools should also allow for meaningful public engagement and feedback where possible.
5.3 Innovation and Action-Oriented Terms of Reference
AJICs must be innovative and action-oriented, not just advisory. They need to inspire, lead and support change by clearly defining problems and crafting solutions and assisting with the piloting, implementation and evaluation of reforms. Early on in the process, AJICs should follow up on various recent mapping initiatives to build on some of the good work that has been done in identifying key players and important initiatives in the access to justice communities.

Key priority areas need to be targeted and promising initiatives developed and pursued, likely through the formation of innovation and implementation working groups within the various AJICs. For example, priority areas could include legal and court services, family law, early resolution services, legal aid, legal education in schools, homelessness, poverty and administrative law, etc. The work and recommendations of the Action Committee, it is hoped, will provide a good place to start.

5.4 Other Sector and Institution Specific Access to Justice Groups
In addition to standing AJICs, other access to justice groups should be encouraged where appropriate in the context of individual organizations and sectors. For example, all courts and tribunals should have an access to justice committee designed to conduct self-studies, share best practices, review performance, develop innovations, etc. Further, all law societies, Bar associations and law schools should create internal standing access to justice committees. These groups should be connected to the AJICs, to avoid duplication and facilitate coordination.

5.5 Establish Permanent National Access to Justice Organization
In addition to the AJICs, a national organization should be established or created within an existing organization or organizations to promote and monitor, on a long-term basis, access to civil and family justice in Canada. Specifically, it will monitor and promote a national access to justice policy framework, best practices and standards; identify and share information, review international developments, potentially conduct and support research on pressing access to justice issues, support “train-the-trainer” programs in the context of AJICs, etc. This organization, which will be critical for continuing the reform agenda following the completion of the Action Committee’s work, will provide a coordinated voice to the access to justice agenda in Canada.

6. Promote a Sustainable, Accessible and Integrated Justice Agenda through Legal Education – By 2016

6.1 Law School, Bar Admission and Continuing Life Long Learning
Law schools, bar admission programs and continuing legal education providers should put a modern access to justice agenda at the forefront of Canadian legal education. This agenda will be an important part of a new legal reform culture. While “[J]ustice incorporates our life ... perhaps it can be taught in school as a life skill so that kids are more aware of what it means to make a choice and do the right thing for themselves and each other.”

- participant in a recent survey on access to justice law faculties will need to develop their own particular research and teaching agendas, and recognizing that many innovative initiatives have already begun, the following initiatives should be developed and expanded.

- Modules, courses and research agendas focused specifically on access to justice, professionalism, public service, diversity, pluralism and globalization. The needs of all individuals, groups and communities, and in particular self-represented litigants, aboriginal communities, immigrants, other marginalized and vulnerable groups and rural communities should be specifically considered.

- Increased skills based learning that focuses on consensual dispute resolution, alternative dispute resolution and other non-adversarial skills.

- Social, community, poverty law, mediation and other clinical, intensive and experiential programs.

- The theory and practice of family law should be promoted as a central feature of the law school program.

- Research and promotion of different ways of delivering legal services that provide affordable and accessible services to the public as well as a meaningful professional experience for lawyers, including a reasonable standard of living.

Similarly, bar admission programs and continuing legal education providers should promote access to justice as a central feature of essentially all lawyering programs.

6.2 Promote Access to Justice Education in Primary, Secondary and Post-Secondary Education

Primary, secondary and post-secondary education should promote teaching and learning about access to justice, law and a just society. Building legal capacity through education helps people to manage their lives, property and relationships, to avoid problems and also to understand and address them effectively when they do arise. As one respondent to a recent access to justice survey put it: “[J]ustice incorporates our life ... perhaps it can be taught in school as a life skill so that kids are more aware of what it means to make a choice and do the right thing for themselves and each other.”

A national dialogue involving Ministries of Education, Ministries of Justice, legal educators, relevant community groups and others should be promoted to push forward a common access to justice framework for schools, colleges and universities. AJICs should play an important role here.

7. Enhance the Innovation Capacity of the Civil and Family Justice System

- By 2016

We need to expand the innovation capacity at all levels and in all sectors of the justice system. The national access to justice organization could be a key leader in this capacity building process, along with the AJICs, other access to justice groups, researchers and others. Research on what exists, what works and what is needed, along with evaluations and metrics of success, will all be important aspects of building innovation capacity.
C. RESEARCH AND FUNDING GOALS

8. Support Access to Justice Research to Promote Evidence-Based Policy Making
   - By 2015

8.1 Promote a National Access to Justice Research and Innovation Agenda that is both Aspirational and Practical
This goal is directed primarily to researchers and governments, but additionally to all those who care about working with and improving the system – including AJICs, etc.

A national research and innovation agenda should be both aspirational and practical. Innovative and forward thinking will be central to this project.²⁵ Equally important to this process, however, will be to look at what works.²⁶ Collaboration among legal researchers, economists, social scientists, health care researchers and others should be encouraged.

8.2 Develop Metrics of Success and Systems of Evaluation
Reliable and meaningful metrics and benchmarks need to be established across all levels of the system in order to evaluate the effects of reform measures. We need better information in the context of increasing demand, increasing costs and stretched fiscal realities.²⁹

Although research on the costs and benefits of delivering and not delivering accessible justice is still developing,²⁰ there is meaningful evidence tending to establish the benefits of sound civil and family economic investment.³⁰ Money spent on the resolution of legal problems results in individual and collective social, health and economic benefits.³¹

Based on this developing body of research, a sustainable justice funding model — recognizing the realities of current fiscal challenges but also recognizing the long term individual and collective social and economic benefits that flow from sound justice investment — needs to be encouraged and developed. There are several aspects to this proposed funding model:

- increased legal aid;
- governments working with participants from all sectors of the justice community;
- funding reallocation within the justice system and across public institutions as better coordination, more effective front end services and better education produce efficiencies;³² and
- AJICs (which will require sustained funding themselves) to identify key research, innovation and action items and to work collaboratively with the national access to justice organization and others toward developing realistic and sustainable funding goals and strategies.
Access to justice is at a critical stage in Canada. Change is urgently needed. This report provides a multi-sector national plan for reform. It is a roadmap, not a repair manual. The approach is to provide leadership through the promotion of concrete development goals. These are recommended goals, not dictates. Specific local conditions or problems call for locally tailored approaches and solutions.

We believe that those responsible for implementing change — all local, provincial, territorial and national justice system stakeholders — will find this roadmap useful for making meaningful reforms in the service of the everyday justice needs of Canadians. The timeframes attached to each development goal are suggestions. They may change depending on the scope of the goal as well as on local needs and conditions.

Although we face serious access to justice challenges, there are many reasons to be optimistic about our ability to bridge the current implementation gap by pursuing concrete access to justice reforms. People within and beyond the civil and family justice system are increasingly engaged by access to justice challenges and many individuals and organizations are already working hard for change.

We hope that the work of the Action Committee and in particular this report will lead to:

- a measurable and significant increase in civil and family access to justice within 5 years;
- a national access to justice policy framework that is widely accepted and adopted;
- local jurisdictions, through AJICs with strong multi-sector leadership, putting in place strategies and mechanisms for meaningful and sustainable change;
- a permanent national body being created and supported to promote, guide and monitor meaningful local and national access to justice initiatives;
- access to civil and family justice becoming a topic of general civic discussion and engagement — an issue of everyday individual and community interest and wellbeing; and
- the public being placed squarely at the centre of all meaningful civil and family justice education and reform efforts.

In this report we have described the need, set out the guiding principles and provided a roadmap for change. Now it is time to act.
Access to Civil and Family Justice: A Roadmap for Change is the final report of the Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters.

The Action Committee is grateful for the tireless efforts of Professor Trevor C.W. Farrow, Osgoode Hall Law School and Chair of the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice, who was the "holder of the pen" for this final report.

ACTION COMMITTEE
The Action Committee was convened in late 2008 at the invitation of the Right Honourable Beverley McLachlin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada as a catalyst for meaningful action to justice reform. The Action Committee, which is a collaborative, consultative and stakeholder-driven initiative, includes:

- The Right Honourable Beverley McLachlin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada (Honorary Chair)
- The Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas A. Cromwell, Supreme Court of Canada (Chair)
- Alberta Justice
- Association of Legal Aid Plans
- Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges
- Canadian Bar Association
- Canadian Council of Chief Judges
- Canadian Forum on Civil Justice
- Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice
- Canadian Judicial Council
- Canadian Superior Court Judges Association
- Canadian Public (represented by Mary Ellen Hodgens)
- Council of Canadian Law Deans
- Department of Justice Canada
- Federation of Law Societies of Canada
- Heads of Court Administration
- British Columbia Ministry of Justice
- Pro Bono Law Ontario
- Public Legal Education Association of Canada

STEERING COMMITTEE, WORKING GROUPS AND SECRETARIAT
The individual members of the Steering Committee of the Action Committee include:

- The Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas A. Cromwell (Chair)
- Mark Benton, Q.C. (Association of Legal Aid Plans)
- Deputy Minister of Justice Raymond Bodnarek, Q.C. (Alberta Justice)
- Melina Buckley, Ph.D. (Canadian Bar Association)
- The Honourable juge en chef Elizabeth Corte (Canadian Council of Chief Judges)
- Rick Craig (Public Legal Education Association of Canada)
- Professor Trevor C.W. Farrow, Ph.D. (Canadian Forum on Civil Justice)
- Jeff Hirsch (Federation of Law Societies of Canada)
- M. Jerry McHale, Q.C. (British Columbia Ministry of Justice)

The Action Committee is extremely grateful to all members of the Steering Committee for their constant leadership and guidance throughout the work of the Action Committee. Much of the work of the Action Committee, designed to look at four key priority areas, was done by four working groups: the Court Processes Simplification Working Group, the Access to Legal Services Working Group, the Prevention, Triage and Referral Working Group, and the Family Justice Working Group. Reports from these working groups (which include lists of their members) were released as a collection of final working group reports in April 2013. The Action Committee is very grateful to the RESEARCH ASSISTANCE AND PUBLICATION INFORMATION

This report was prepared as part of the Action Committee’s overall collaborative and consultative process, with direct guidance from the Steering Committee and in consultation with Mary Ellen Hodgins (on behalf of the Canadian public). Research and publication assistance was provided by the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice. The Action Committee has also relied heavily — and at times directly — on the reports of the Action Committee’s four working groups.

Comments on this report can be sent to the Action Committee through the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice, online at: <communications@cfjc-fcjc.org>.

The Action Committee consists of senior representatives from many organizations in the justice system and a representative of the Canadian public, who share a commitment to working together to improve access to justice for the Canadian public. This report offers a general consensus on the issues discussed, but does not necessarily reflect the formal position of each of the respective organizations represented.

This report is published by the Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters, Ottawa, Canada, October 2013.

FUNDING AND SUPPORT

Funding and other support for the work of the Action Committee has been generously provided by its member organizations. The Action Committee would like to thank the member organizations, as well as the individual representatives of those organizations, who have worked so hard to support the work of the Action Committee. The Action Committee would like further to acknowledge with specific gratitude the significant funding and other support from:

- Alberta Justice and Solicitor General
- Canadian Forum on Civil Justice
- Canadian Judicial Council
- Department of Justice Canada
- Law Foundation of British Columbia
- Federation of Law Societies of Canada
- Osgoode Hall Law School

members of these working groups for their significant efforts. The working group reports can be found on the website of the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice (http://www.cfjc-fcjc.org/collaborations).

The Action Committee would also like to thank members of its effective and efficient secretariat at the Department of Justice for Canada who have worked tirelessly to support the work of the Action Committee, the Steering Committee and the working groups.

2As the Chief Justice of Canada recently acknowledged, “Regrettably, we do not have adequate access to justice in Canada.” Rt. Hon. Beverley McLachlin, P.C., from “Forward” in Michael Trebilcock, Anthony Duggan and Lorne Sossin, eds., Middle Income Access to Justice (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2012) at ix. Similarly, according to Justice Thomas Cromwell: "By nearly any standard, our current situation falls far short of providing access to the knowledge, resources and services that allow people to deal effectively with civil and family legal matters. There is a mountain of evidence to support this view." Hon. Thomas A. Cromwell, “Access to Justice: Towards a Collaborative and Strategic Approach”, Viscount Bennett Memorial Lecture, (2012) 63 U.N.B.L.J. 38 at 39.

4See, for example, the following comments from Justice Thomas Cromwell:

In general terms, members of our society would have appropriate access to civil and family justice if they had the knowledge, resources and services to deal effectively with civil and family legal matters. I emphasize that I do not have a “court-centric” view of what this knowledge in these resources and services include. They include a range of out-of-court services, including access to knowledge about the law and the legal process and both formal and informal dispute resolution services, including those available through the courts. I do not view access to justice … as simply access to litigation or even simply as access to lawyers, judges and courts, although these are, of course, aspects of what access to justice requires.

7See Currie, The Legal Problems of Everyday Life, ibid. at 2, 10-12.

8Everyday legal problems — often termed “justiciable problems” — include a broad range of problems that might raise legal issues and/or might be addressed by way of legal solutions. See e.g. Hazel Genn et al., Paths to Justice: What People do and Think About Going to Law (Oxford: Hart, 1999) at v-vi, 12, and generally c. 2. See further Currie, The Legal Problems of Everyday Life, supra note 6 at 5-6; Pascoe Pleasence et al., Causes of Action: Civil Law and Social Justice (Norwich: Legal Services Commission, 2004) at 1. For a recent Australian study, see Christine Coumarelos et al., Legal
"As the Chief Justice of Canada has further recognized, the “most advanced justice system in the world is a failure if it does not provide justice to the people it is meant to serve.” Rt. Hon. Beverley McLachlin, P.C., “The Challenges We Face”, supra note 1 [citation omitted].

Legal Aid Alberta, “Accessing Legal Aid: Eligibility”, online: LAA <http://www.legalaid.ab.ca/help/Pages/Eligibility.aspx>. In some cases certain limited advice may be available for individuals and families earning slightly more than these amounts. See ibid.

See e.g. Legal Aid Ontario, “Types of help”, online: LAO <http://www.legalaid.on.ca/en/getting/typesofhelp.asp>.

39Ibid. at 36. As a general matter, a 3-day civil trial is often considered to cost overall in the range of $60,000 (or more depending on the amounts and issues involved). See e.g. Tracey Tyler, "A 3-day trial likely to cost you $60,000" Toronto Star (3 March 2007), online: <http://www.thestar.com/news/2007/03/03/a_3day_trial_likely_to_cost_you_60000.html>.

39For example, in the U.K., the cost of family law cases involving children reportedly increased by 71% between 1998 and 2003, while the average length of a family law case rose from 50 weeks in 1998 to 63 weeks in 2003. See Vicky Kemp, Pascoe Pleasence and Nigel J. Balmer, "Incentivising Disputes: The Role of Public Funding in Private Law Children Cases" (2005) 27 J. Soc. Welfare & Fam. L. 125 at 126. Indicators of rising costs and fees have also been reported in Australia and Canada. In Australia, see e.g. PricewaterhouseCoopers, Economic value of legal aid: Analysis in relation to Commonwealth funded matters with a focus on family law (Australia: Legal Aid Queensland, 2009) at 15. One recent Canadian report indicates that "many [law firms] increased their legal fees in 2011 and 2012". See Santry, "The Going Rate", supra note 27 at 33. However, according to the same report, of those who responded, 56% plan to freeze their fees in 2013. See ibid.

39As the Chief Justice of Canada has recognized, "Among the hardest hit are the middle class. They earn too much to qualify for legal aid, but frequently not enough to retain a lawyer for a matter of any complexity or length. When it comes to the justice system, the majority of Canadians do not have access to sufficient resources of their own, nor do they have access to the safety net programs established by the government." See also Canadian Bar Association, Envisioning Equal Justice Project, Equal Justice Report: An Invitation to Envision and Act, supra note 3.

42 This problem has been acknowledged and described by the Chief Justice of Canada as follows: "Unfortunately, many Canadian men and women find themselves unable, mainly for financial reasons, to access the Canadian justice system. Some of them decide to become their own lawyers. Our courtrooms today are filled with litigants who are not represented by counsel, trying to navigate the sometimes complex demands of law and procedure. Others simply give up."

43 As Justice Thomas Cromwell has observed, "I have serious concerns that we have hit the iceberg but are being too slow to recognize the seriousness of the damage…. The problem is real and growing." Hon. Thomas A. Cromwell, Address in 68 Bulletin (Spring 2011) 22 at 23 (on the occasion of his induction as an Honorary Fellow of the American College of Trial Lawyers, Washington, D.C., 22 October 2011).

Much of the detail and analysis (and examples) that animate these innovation goals can be found in the four Action Committee working group reports (discussed further in the Acknowledgments section of this report).

Much of the material in this section of the report is very much influenced by, and in some cases directly draws on, the materials and discussions included in: Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters, Prevention, Triage and Referral Working Group, "Responding Early, Responding Well: Access to Justice through the Early Resolution Services Sector" supra note 54.

As Australia’s Attorney-General’s Department recently acknowledged:

“Courts are not the primary means by which people resolve their disputes. They never have been. Very few civil disputes reach formal justice mechanisms such as courts, and fewer reach final determination. Most disputes are resolved without recourse to formal legal institutions or dispute resolution mechanisms. To improve the quality of dispute resolution, justice must be maintained in individuals’ daily activities, and dispute resolution mechanisms situated within a community and economic context. Reform should focus on everyday justice, not simply the mechanics of legal institutions which people may not understand or be able to afford...”

Similarly, according to Marc Galanter:

Just as health is not found primarily in hospitals or knowledge in schools, so justice is not primarily to be found in official justice-dispensing institutions. Ultimately, access to justice is not just a matter of bringing cases to a font of official justice, but of enhancing the justice quality of the relations and transactions in which people are engaged.
Marc Galanter, "Justice in Many Rooms" in Mauro Cappelletti, ed., Access to Justice and the Welfare State (Alphen aan den Rijn: Sijthoff; Brussels: Bruylant; Florence: Le Monnier; Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1981) 147 at 161-162, cited in Access to Justice Taskforce, Attorney-General’s Department, A Strategic Framework for Access to Justice in the Federal Civil Justice System, ibid. at 3. It is important to recognize, however, that even in the context of informal mechanisms, the formal justice system - through the production of precedents as well as the potential recourse to its use - plays a significant influencing role. See e.g. Robert H. Mnookin and L. Kornhauser, "Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: The Case of Divorce" (1979) 88 Yale L.J. 950.

For example, in Québec, the Montréal Bar has prepared a best practices guide for litigation. In Newfoundland and Labrador, there are various booklets available both at the courts and in the Public Legal Information Association’s office on a range of legal topics. In Ontario, the Ministry of the Attorney General has created several self-help guides that clarify procedures under the family court rules. Additionally, LawHelp Ontario (a pro bono Ontario project) provides various information booklets and how-to manuals for self-represented litigants.

In Alberta, for example, Law Information Centres provide information about general court procedures and Family Law Information Centres employ staff members who provide advice regarding family law procedures.

See e.g. Court of Queen’s Bench of Alberta, Notice to the Profession, “Case Management Counsel Pilot Project”, NP#2011-03 (30 September 2011), online: Alberta Courts <http://www.albertacourts.ab.ca/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=liayJcYAbf%3D&tabid=92&mid=704>.

See e.g. the Québec Superior Court initiative that uses a panel of judges who encourage early reconciliation and conciliation and, if necessary, the use of simplified procedures for various matters including latent defects, inheritance issues, property boundary issues, etc.

For examples of jurisdictions with e-filing options, see Superior Court and Court of Appeal in British Columbia, the Court of Appeal in Alberta, the Superior Court in Newfoundland and Labrador (in estate matters), and the Federal Court of Canada.

For example, B.C. Court Services Online is an electronic service that provides electronic searches of court files, online access to daily court lists and e-filing capacity. For its part, the Alberta Court of Appeal has a practice direction that supports e-appeals if both parties consent or if the court makes such an order.

See e.g. the real time court order initiatives in provincial court – civil in Edmonton and Calgary.

See e.g. Alberta Justice and Solicitor General’s Technology Assisted Mediation program, developed in 2009, which parties can now attend via Skype.

For example, the Superior Court in Nova Scotia employs a communications director to answer questions from the general public and the media. Further, the Supreme Court of Canada, for example, is now on Twitter. See Supreme Court of Canada, online: <http://twitter.com/#/scc_csc>.

For a recent study on costs and the civil and family justice system, see Canadian Forum on Civil Justice, “The Cost of Justice: Weighing the Costs of Fair and Effective Resolution to Legal Problems”, supra note 17.

For example, according to one Australian study in the specific context of family cases, legal aid assistance in relation to courts and dispute resolution services demonstrated a positive efficiency benefit for the justice system. Specifically, these benefits reportedly outweighed the costs of providing the services in a range from a return of $1.60 to $2.25 for every dollar spent. See PricewaterhouseCoopers, Economic value of legal aid: Analysis in relation to Commonwealth funded matters with a focus on family law, supra note 29 at ix and c. 5. According to a different U.S.-based study, the return on investment for every $1 spent on civil legal aid funding was as high as $6. See Public Welfare Foundation, “Natural Allies: Philanthropy and Civil Legal Aid” (Washington, D.C.: Public Welfare Foundation and the Kresge Foundation, 2013) at 3, online: Public Welfare Foundation <http://www.publicwelfare.org/NaturalAllies.pdf> [citation omitted]. For example, according to a recent U.S. study, money spent on civil legal assistance for protecting against domestic violence had a significant positive protective outcome. It also had a significant collective economic impact, reportedly saving costs for the Interest on Lawyers Account Fund of New York State for medical care, lost wages, police resources, counseling for affected children, etc., in the amounts of $6 million in 2009 and $36 million over the years 2005-2009. An invitation to envision and act

Dear Colleagues,

A moment of opportunity is at hand: a moment created by a broad consensus on the need for significant change to improve access to justice, and an evolving consensus on the central directions for reform. This report is an invitation to act, to seize that opportunity. Each of us has a responsibility to contribute to our shared vision of equal access to justice across Canada, from sea to sea.

The term we refers to all of us, to affirm the important role and obligation of all justice system stakeholders, including the public, to contribute to equal justice. To refer to the authors, members of the Canadian Bar Association (CBA) Access to Justice Committee, the Committee is employed.

Our understanding of the prevalence of legal problems and the severe and disruptive impact of unresolved legal problems has grown exponentially over the past two decades. But we have yet to fully translate that knowledge into action. Many organizations are dedicating a tremendous amount of energy and limited resources to new approaches to improve access to justice. Still, we have been unable to knit this work together to make substantial gains.

I sense here a tremendous level of commitment to making meaningful change in access to justice. That deep commitment is necessary because this will take long term sustained effort. I was reminded recently that Martin Luther King’s famous speech did not start with “I have a plan”. Of course he had a plan but he first needed to persuade people that change was needed and that things could get better. I hope we leave here with a shared sense of the dream and a commitment to do what we can to make it come true… we need a shared understanding of what success would look like.

So I ask: Is there a widespread firm belief that there is an urgent need for significant change? Do we have the dream and is it widely shared? If not, I doubt we will accomplish very much.

Justice Thomas Cromwell
Keynote Speech at CBA Envisioning Equal Justice Summit
April 2013
To mobilize and take advantage of this moment, we first need to convey the abysmal state of access to justice in Canada today. We need to make visible the pain caused by inadequate access and the huge discrepancies between the promise of justice and the lived reality of barriers and impediments. Inaccessible justice costs us all, but visits its harshest consequences on the poorest people in our communities. We need to illuminate how profoundly unequal access to justice is in Canada. We cannot shy away from the dramatic level of change required: in a very fundamental sense we live in “a world thick in law but thin in legal resources”. We need to radically redress this imbalance.

This report and the summary report published last summer provide a strategic framework for action, to set a new direction for the national conversation on access to justice. They are meant to present our current state of knowledge about what is wrong, what types of changes are essential, and the steps and approaches we might take to overcome barriers to equal justice. The objective is to bring together and render the key ideas concrete, to enable and encourage action.

Both reports are designed to engage, rather than dictate or provide ‘the answer’. The goal is to enlarge and change the conversation about access to justice to invite and inspire action.

Our greatest challenge is to simultaneously focus on individual innovations and the broader context of the interdependence of all aspects of access to justice. Collaboration works best when based on a shared understanding of the problem and a shared vision of the end goals. Our central animating principle must be envisioning a truly equal justice system, one that provides meaningful and effective access to all, taking into account the diverse lives that people live.

We have a lot of work to do and that work needs to be shared over a broader segment of the legal profession and other justice system personnel than are currently engaged in the access project. While there are some signs of exhaustion, regeneration is in the air. At the CBA Envisioning Equal Justice Summit in April 2013, we witnessed and participated in a radically different conversation, an energized and optimistic conversation about equal access to justice. The reports build on this important breakthrough.

We are poised to make gains at this juncture, but need to travel a little farther for the momentum already achieved to become an irresistible force and take over. As Justice Cromwell of the Supreme Court of Canada said in his Keynote Address at the Summit, this is a critical moment.

The CBA has already pledged to take action and continue to play its role in contributing to equal access to justice. Members of the Committee have taken this on as a personal challenge.

and we urge you to join us. The challenge is to each think of our roles in the justice system more expansively, each working to produce the best possible results for our individual clients, the individual case, in our association or institution, and simultaneously working to produce the best possible justice system. In a riff on the idea of thinking globally, acting locally, the Committee asks you to think systemically, act locally.

Though we are all busy, we can integrate this change in perspective, to work simultaneously on the matter at hand while contributing to broader systemic goals. At first this may appear to conflict with our professional duties to give one hundred percent to the individual client or matter. Yet we know that zero-sum thinking is almost always false: few situations are truly either/or. For lawyers, this challenge can be seen as an extension of our professional duty as officers of the court. By thinking systemically and acting locally, we can create real space for justice innovation.

Rather than simply reading this report, the Committee asks you to engage with it. Consider the targets proposed and the change-oriented ideas and ask yourself: what can I do, either myself or working with others, to contribute to equal access to justice? Every contact between an individual and the civil justice system is an opportunity for either disempowerment or empowerment, a moment to reinforce inequality and social exclusion or to create equality and inclusion.

As craftily stated in a slogan brainstormed during the Summit’s closing plenary, we need to just(ice) do it!

Thank you,
CBA Access to Justice Committee
Introduction

Through the Equal Justice Initiative, the CBA Access to Justice Committee considers four systemic barriers that are blocking efforts to reach equal justice and proposes means to overcome them. The barriers are:

- Lack of public profile
- Inadequate strategy and coordination
- No effective mechanisms for measuring change
- Gaps in our knowledge about what works and how to achieve substantive change

The initiative focuses on human justice, on people law – legal issues, problems and disputes experienced by people (including small businesses), especially those that involve essential legal needs. We understand essential legal needs to be those arising from legal problems or situations that put into jeopardy the security of a person or that person's family's security – including liberty, personal security, health, employment, housing or ability to meet the basic necessities of life and extending to other urgent legal needs. Of course, the justice system has an impact on corporations, organizations and institutions, and access issues can arise for these bodies as well, but they are outside of the scope of this report.3

The Equal Justice Initiative focuses for the most part on the civil justice system, touching only indirectly on criminal law matters. The Committee recognizes that reaching equal justice engages both civil and criminal justice issues and the interconnection between the two. The focal point is on non-criminal matters because substantive change in the civil justice system has a particular urgency and timeliness, and current initiatives in this area are especially fragmented and under-resourced. There is no hard and fast dividing line, however, and some proposals made here are also relevant to the criminal justice system.

3 The CBA Legal Futures Initiative considers some of these broader issues.
type of action required. Achieving these targets will require individual, coordinated and collaborative efforts – no target falls to a sole justice system player.

This report also gathers together what the Committee has learned over the course of its Initiative and shares it with all individuals and organizations engaged in justice innovation and committed to equal justice. It is a resource for the implementation process, providing background information and detailed discussion relevant to each target. Wherever practicable, it includes examples of emerging good practices and insights from research and evaluations, as well as links to further information.

A summary version of this report was tabled in August 2013 at the CBA Canadian Legal Conference in Saskatoon.

The Committee solicits feedback to these proposals and looks forward to an active and engaged dialogue. At the end of each section is a link to provide your feedback on the targets, milestones and actions, your suggestions on specific innovations and ideas, and your commitment to become involved on the issues on which you are especially passionate. Please join the conversation and take action!

We have a window of opportunity that only comes along rarely - to put it simply, let's not blow it.

Justice Thomas Cromwell, Keynote Speech at CBA Envisioning Equal Justice Summit, April 2013

The Committee's work complements the work of the National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters (National Action Committee). Under the stewardship of Justice Thomas Cromwell, the National Action Committee has created a strong awareness of the need for change. Its working group reports have identified a large range of initiatives that have potential for increasing access to justice. The National Action Committee final report provides additional overall guidance, especially on implementing these suggested reforms. The CBA is a member and supporter of the National Action Committee process. Like all members, the CBA has an obligation to contribute what it can. It is anticipated that both the National Action Committee and CBA reports will assist in making the most of this critical opportunity to achieve the substantive change needed to reach equal justice across Canada.

Contemporaneous to the CBA Equal Justice Initiative is the CBA Legal Futures Initiative, a comprehensive examination of the future of the legal profession in Canada. It examines business structures and innovations, legal education and training and ethics and regulation of the profession. Its mandate is to develop original research, consult widely with the profession and other stakeholders and ultimately create a framework for ideas, approaches and tools to assist the legal profession in adapting to future changes. The Legal Futures Initiative identifies access to justice as a foundational value underlying its work.

Recognizing the Power of Words

Words are the tools of the justice system’s trade, yet finding the right words is not always easy. This is especially true in choosing words to refer to groups of people. We often refer to people involved in the justice system as ‘clients’ or ‘users,’ but the Committee has opted to instead employ ‘people’ wherever feasible to avoid reducing the individual’s role in the justice system to a passive category of recipient of services.

A particular challenge is finding an elegant, inclusive way to refer to groups of people who have been or continue to be excluded from systems, structures and institutions, including the justice system. It is difficult to find language that recognizes the diversity of identity, experience and social situation without creating an ‘us-them’ distinction, or, alternatively, ignoring the reality of different needs, capacities and perspectives. It is important to recognize this tension between language that is inclusive and language that reinforces disadvantage. Our approach is to use the phrase “people living in marginalized conditions” or “situations of disadvantage”. While not a perfect solution, nor one that always works in constructing intelligible sentences, it reflects the Committee’s intention to show respect by separating the person, who is always a person, from the social and economic situation in which they live, while recognizing that this situation can and often does have an impact on their justice system experiences.

In the report, particularly in the proposed targets, the Committee uses the term “Canadians” to refer to all people living in Canada regardless of their citizenship status.
PART I

why change is necessary
Why change is necessary

Public confidence in the justice system is declining. This was apparent during the consultation phase of the CBA Envisioning Equal Justice Initiative. People interviewed randomly ‘on the street’, and in meetings with marginalized communities consistently described the justice system as not to be trusted, only for people with money, arbitrary, difficult to navigate and inaccessible to ordinary people. The Committee’s findings are not unique. Two recent surveys of people who represented themselves in civil courts concluded that the experience usually led to reduced confidence in the justice system as have other public consultations over the past few years.

While there is generally low public awareness about legal aid, opinion polls have shown that when asked more detailed questions, people express strong and consistent support for providing adequate publicly funded legal aid. Polls have shown overwhelming support (91-96%), with 65-74% expressing the view that legal aid should receive the same funding priority as other important social services. Canadians believe justice systems must be accessible to all to be, in fact, just – and publicly funded services are required to get to equal justice. The current lack of confidence in our justice system suggests instead a perception that justice is inaccessible and even unfair.

People’s Perceptions and Experiences of the Justice System Today

Our change strategies and priorities must be grounded in people’s experiences of the justice system today. Amanda Dodge pointed out in her presentation at the CBA’s Envisioning Equal Justice Summit: “when we gather to dialogue and strategize about increasing access to justice, if we do so without listening to the voices of those we are trying to serve, we risk developing ineffective measures, as well as the legitimacy of our efforts.”

This report reflects the Committee’s commitment to a people-centered justice system by bringing in the public voice from the outset. The nine ‘stories’ in this section illustrate typical experiences with the justice system. The stories are composites of many people’s experiences, rather than exact events experienced by a particular person. They allow us in some small way to “come face to face with the anxiety and desperation of ordinary citizens who look to our legal system for their fair share of decent treatment.” The stories highlight the complex nature of legal problems and deeply rooted underlying causes. They show non-legal dimensions of the situation that often exist prior to contact with the justice system but which must also be confronted. Recent consultation reports and studies have confirmed the widespread nature of barriers to meaningful access to the justice system, but nothing is more compelling than stories like those happening to real people every day.
PART I       why change is necessary

This section also summarizes consultations: these include the Committee’s focus group consultations with people living in marginalized conditions; ‘on the street’ interviews organized by the Committee and those conducted in a separate initiative of the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice. Altogether, 161 people participated in the CBA sessions. In addition, the findings from two recent studies of people who represented themselves in civil courts are reviewed.

Consultations with People Living in Marginalized Conditions

As part of the CBA’s Envisioning Equal Justice Initiative, the Committee worked with community partners in Calgary, Saskatoon, Toronto, Montreal and the Maritimes to hold 13 consultation sessions.
These focus group sessions were held exclusively with people living in marginalized conditions:
low-income adults and youth; racialized groups;
single mothers; and people with disabilities. The conversations focused on two questions: what happens when access to justice is denied and what happens when it is afforded. The results were profound and often shocking, and sadly replicate the perspectives, experiences and themes heard in other recent public hearings and town hall sessions in Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia.11

The consultation outcomes are reported under four themes of what the Committee heard: legal rights are just on paper; justice systems cannot be trusted; justice is person-dependent, and justice systems are difficult to navigate.

Legal Rights are Just on Paper

“It always feels like, oh, that’s the law and there’s nothing you can do about it.”
Aboriginal woman, Saskatoon

pray.” Aboriginal woman, Saskatoon “Once you finally get there and you get an order, there is nobody there to enforce it. This is what I needed. Now that I have an Order, it’s not being respected and there is no one to do anything.” Single mother, Moncton

“To me, legal rights are an unfulfilled promise.”
Person with disability, Toronto.

The vast majority of community members acknowledged that the law affords rights and protections, but felt those rights and protections were not honoured or accessible. When asked about legal rights, most participants stated plainly that they did not feel they had any legal rights.

It seemed that as a person’s marginalization increased, so did the distance to being able to enforce their legal rights. The primary barrier to feeling as though one could access legal rights was, not surprisingly, a lack of financial resources.

Community members identified many other barriers to accessing legal rights and protections.
Commonly mentioned were literacy and language barriers, disabilities (both physical and mental), racial discrimination and level of education. Lack of knowledge seemed to be the greatest initial hurdle to enforcing legal rights. Lack of knowledge and information also aggravated the emotional impact of going through justice processes.

The community members recognized that impediments sometimes depend on the individual. They pointed to certain personality characteristics, like tenacity, or attitudes, such as optimism, as determinative of whether someone would pursue legal rights and protections.

When community members were asked whether the law would protect them from abuses of power, or hold a person in authority accountable for breaking the rules, the most common response was to laugh out loud. They pointed to significant barriers to holding authority figures to account: they did not know how to make a complaint; they did not know where to go; there was not enough information about how to do it; they did not think they would be believed or taken seriously; they thought they would be intimidated or taken seriously; they thought they would be intimidated and made to feel stupid; and they were afraid.

Justice Systems Cannot Be Trusted

“If you believe in the system and think it will help you, you’ll get burned.” Aboriginal woman, Saskatoon

“Justice is to protect us, not to abuse us. It has been used to overpower or manipulate us.”

Aboriginal woman, Saskatoon

“I feel intimidated and bullied by the legal system.”

Domestic violence survivor, Calgary

A strong message heard throughout the consultations is that, inherently, the system is untrustworthy and broken. Several people reported feeling betrayed and abused by the justice system.

The brokenness of the system was evident in the frustrations expressed by community members. Both parties to disputes and adjudications reported that the systems had failed them: offenders and victims, applicants and respondents. Neither side felt the system was fair or had worked for them. There was a sense that they had to find justice on their own.

Excessive and harmful delay was often cited as a frustration. The system itself creates delay. Community members described having to attend court for repeated adjournments, to wait many months to be heard in court, to miss work for repeated court appearances and to wait for legal aid’s help. Delay is a frustrating barrier to enforcing legal rights and attaining some measure of justice.

Second, delay is created by community members’ lack of information. Insufficient guidance wastes their time. Often the delay is harmful, leading to negative consequences in other areas of their lives.

Some community members defined justice as the right to be heard. Many reported that they were not afforded an opportunity to tell their stories. Even when they did get a chance to tell their story, they often felt they were not believed or taken seriously.

One clear concern was that the justice system does not recognize or understand the social and personal realities of the people living in marginalized conditions progressing through it.

This results in other sorts of problems. One, the system and its actions actually perpetuate or aggravate the problems that got people involved in the system initially.

The second problem created by the system’s ignorance of the social and personal realities of people living in marginalized conditions is that it has a “spiraling and multiplying”\(^\text{12}\) effect, so...
Eugene’s story

At thirty years of age, Eugene lives in a bachelor apartment in northern British Columbia. He is schizophrenic, a disabling medical condition that is hard to control even with medication, and he cannot hold a job. He receives income assistance from the provincial government but his rent subsidy is not enough, as rent is high and there are few rental units in town. He dips into his food budget for rent, and then goes to the food bank.

Eugene hasn’t seen his father since his parents divorced several years ago. His mother lives in Vancouver, like him, on a fixed income. He almost never sees his sister in Ontario, who won’t return his phone calls because he owes her a lot of money.

Two months ago, some friends came over to visit with a couple of other guys Eugene didn’t know. Later, Eugene realized that someone stole the cash he had in an envelope on the shelf to pay his rent and for food. When his rent was due, his landlord said he would give him 30 days grace, but he would have to pay two month’s rent at the end of the 30 days, or he would be evicted. Eugene called his income assistance worker but she said there was nothing she can do.

The 30 days are almost up and Eugene only has enough money for one month’s rent. His landlord gave him a paper saying he must move out. The stress has triggered his condition, and he can often not get out of bed in the morning. His income assistance worker told him legal aid doesn’t help with landlord-tenant disputes, but gave him a toll-free number for legal help. He called the number, but was embarrassed when he didn’t really understand what the person told him, and hung up. Right now he is waiting for the police to come and kick him out of his apartment.
problems spread to other areas of their lives, often worsening them significantly.

Lastly, community members often felt that the remedies they obtained from the justice system were not meaningful or trustworthy. For example, women in particular reported enduring the delay, frustration and trauma of family courts only to obtain an order that was meaningless, as not enforced.

Justice System is Person-Dependent

“Having [the] right person is key.” Person with disability, Toronto

“[I]t depends on the person ... have they had experience, sensitivity training, do they or don’t they know what [they] need to do[?] Sometimes [I] go to family law clinic and [it] depends on whether the nice lawyer shows up...” Deaf woman, Durham

“Some judges are terrific, some have no patience, some want to listen ... others just want to get through [it].” Deaf woman, Waterloo

“With lawyers you get the good with the bad, some who care, some who don’t.” Deaf man, Toronto

When community members discussed their satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the justice system, it often reflected on the particular justice professional they encountered. Whether the service or experience was effective, fair or compassionate depended on the individual, be it the judge, lawyer or police officer. A frequently repeated phrase was ‘it’s the luck of the draw’.

There were some commendations but more complaints about the quality and compassion of the justice professionals.

There were positive comments about judges being open-minded and good listeners, and making fair decisions. However, more often concerns and criticisms were expressed.

Judges were not fully trusted and sometimes viewed as biased. Many community members felt pre-judged when they walked into the courtroom. Some identified factors seemingly unrelated to their case that affected its outcome, such as judge's relationship with the lawyers before them.

The consensus was that having a lawyer increased the likelihood of having help and guidance through the process. Without a lawyer, marginalized community members felt left to flounder. However, whether a lawyer was helpful or effective, whether legal aid or private, was again seen as the ‘the luck of the draw’. It seemed that the ‘good ones’ are the minority; frequently the comment was that if you get a good lawyer, you’re ‘lucky’.

Many community members expressed dissatisfaction with legal aid lawyers. They complained about poor service, delay, lack of caring, a focus on just wanting to ‘do deals’, lawyers not wanting to listen and not wanting to fight for them. Community members often believed the cause of the poor service was that legal aid lawyers were overworked and underpaid.

Regarding legal aid’s scope of service, community members complained about the limits in service provision, including low financial eligibility guidelines, and that the services were always reactive, not proactive.

Community members clearly distinguished between legal aid and private lawyers, and generally had a higher opinion of private lawyers. There were repeated comments that when lawyers were paid more money, they were more likely to fight for and do a better job for clients. Private lawyers were perceived as more effective and acting more quickly than legal aid lawyers. Private lawyers were perceived as friendlier with judges than legal aid lawyers and thus more likely to get their way in court.

In spite of these generally negative observations, several marginalized community members had positive experiences. There was some discussion about how more ‘good’ lawyers, those committed to social justice, were needed. Community members believed that greater financial reward in other areas of the profession was the main reason...
Phuong’s story

Phuong was in her local drugstore in Canora, Saskatchewan. It was hot and she wasn’t feeling well. She had spent the night before in the emergency room with her sick daughter.

Her first mistake was to use her cloth shopping bag instead of the store basket. She forgot to get a basket at the door, and was rushing to get back to her daughter. Her second mistake was not to double check the bag at the checkout. Two prescriptions were tucked in a side pocket and she forgot to pay for them.

The security guard and the policewoman who came later to arrest her did not believe that she was exhausted and just forgot. She can’t understand it, as she buys all her prescriptions at this store and always pays.

Her friend says to call legal aid in Saskatoon, but they won’t help as she wouldn’t likely go to jail for this. As a personal support worker, she has no money for a lawyer, but there are no lawyers in her community anyway. She goes to court on the day it says on her papers, and a nice young woman introduces herself as the crown prosecutor. Phuong agrees to plead guilty even though she didn’t mean to steal — in Vietnam, it is very frightening to be involved with the police. She received a conditional discharge with six months’ supervised probation.

A while later, Phuong’s boss asks all employees to update their papers for a criminal record check. Phuong has worked for this agency for five years and her clients all love her so she thinks if it comes up, she’ll just explain what happened to her manager. But the results go directly to the management office, and Phuong is fired on the spot. Her manager says the company would be sued if they let someone who had shoplifted go into elderly people’s homes.

Phuong has no references to show Canadian experience and can’t find another job. Employment Insurance declines her benefits because she was fired due to theft. The relative who sponsored her to come to Canada would have to pay for anything she gets from welfare, so she won’t consider applying for welfare. She thinks of ending her life, but wonders who will care for her daughter.
there were too few social justice oriented lawyers, but they were aware that such lawyers existed.

Justice System is Difficult to Navigate

“They’re supposed to be there to help you, but that’s not what happens. If you’re asking for help, it’s because there’s something wrong with you.” Single mother, Montréal

“I feel alone and I don’t know who I am supposed to contact.” Single mother, Moncton

“It is overwhelming ... you feel incapacitated.” Single mother, Moncton

“It is the stress of all the steps prior to getting to the step where you can even act out your rights, and you get so frustrated with process.” Deaf woman, Toronto

Community members consistently complained that the justice system is confusing and difficult to navigate. They pointed out that ignorance of one’s legal rights renders them useless. Information is not readily available. They were unsure where to go for help or which forms to use. People are not directed to the right place and often have no one to guide them. They reported feeling like they were ‘running in circles’ as systems are not integrated; they are in ‘silos’.

Many community members reported that lack of information, help and direction exacted an emotional toll. They described how scary and intimidating it is not to know what is happening, what the options are, what possible outcomes might be, and so on. They mentioned the anxiety, fear, frustration, discouragement and stress involved in progressing through justice systems, encountering seemingly endless obstacles. They also talked about their need for emotional support.

Community members described a justice system that is simply overwhelming, too complex, too complicated. They talked about the many steps involved in pursuing a right or protection, such as obtaining information, translating the information, paying the fee, finding an advocate, arranging for an interpreter, and then tackling the legal issue and the opposing party. It seems a Herculean effort is required to deal with a formalistic, lengthy and daunting process, something they said was very discouraging and often insurmountable.

Other barriers to navigating the system were fear of facing the opposing party, desire for privacy (concerns about the Court or tribunal being a public forum, and lawyers speaking openly about their cases in an open hallway), poverty and financial constraints, transportation, child care, interpretive services and arranging and funding accommodation.

These difficulties and barriers to navigating the system are so frustrating, upsetting and discouraging that many community members said they would ‘just give up’ rather than tackle those challenges. When they described experiences where they did pursue their legal rights or protections, it was often framed as a fight against the odds.
Glynnis’ story

Glynnis’ life is a story of abuse and neglect. Both of her parents grew up in residential schools and had serious problems with alcoholism. Glynnis left her northern Alberta First Nation community when she was 14 and has lived outside of Fort Smith, NWT, ever since. She doesn’t read or write very well, but held decent jobs until the last couple of years. Her daughter Destiny was born when she was 20. Destiny is well cared for, excels in school and loves her mother very much.

Glynnis has a criminal record; her last offence was possession of a narcotic about 15 years ago. She has continued to use marijuana for years to dull the pain of her past. Recently, she has not been able to keep a job and has started trafficking marijuana to make ends meet. She knows she cannot keep trafficking or she could lose her daughter but her social assistance, about $1100 a month, is not enough for her and Destiny to live on. Recently, police noticed adults and young people coming and going from her house. She has been charged with trafficking.

Glynnis appeared in court without a lawyer and pled guilty to possession of marijuana for purposes of trafficking. She was later sentenced by a Territorial Court judge to three months’ imprisonment with one year probation. The pre-sentence report described her painful childhood, difficulties in school, problems with drugs and alcohol, mental health struggles and the positive parenting she has provided to her daughter. It didn’t mention her First Nations ancestry or what services her First Nation might provide. The legal aid lawyer at the sentencing hearing was very busy and did not ask her much. The judge concentrated on the fact that young people, including her daughter, had been exposed to her drug operation and sentenced her to 18 months in jail.

Glynnis has had no contact with her band since leaving Alberta, and never thought she’d have access to treatment programs, either through her First Nation or in her small town. She now lives in a women’s correctional centre in Fort Smith, over 700 hundred kilometres from Destiny, who is in a group home in Yellowknife. Glynnis has heard girls at the home are involved in drugs or maybe prostitution. She feels worthless and helpless to make things better. She is now using the harder drugs available in the institution.
On the Street Perceptions

Working with Pro Bono Student Canada volunteers, the Committee conducted random interviews with people on the street to ask for their views on whether there is access to justice in Canada, if they would know what to do if they had a legal problem and what they thought a truly accessible system would look like. The Canadian Forum on Civil Justice implemented a similar project and shared their interviews with the Committee. What these people have to say is surprising and affirming, discouraging and inspiring.

First, people were asked to talk about the “dark sky”: what a lack of access to justice really looks and feels like. Some of what was said includes:

“Horrible! The rich get off. If you have money you can walk.” Older man, Toronto

“My husband and I are middle income so we have access to a justice system. Those who can’t afford access to lawyers do not have access to a justice system.” Middle aged woman, Victoria

“You see it every day on the news. The richer you are the more you get away with, and that’s just not fair. That’s what the judicial system you’d hope would be out of everything, fair.” Middle aged man, Windsor

“Often people with fewer resources experience more persecution, marginalization and injustice, and that’s not fair. That’s something I would really like to see change in the world.” Young woman, Victoria

Interestingly, compared to the representatives of communities living in marginalized conditions who participated in the focus groups, people interviewed on the street had less experience with and demonstrated limited knowledge of the justice system. For example, they held false impressions about the availability of publicly funded legal resources.
Anna’s story

Fleeing violence from her husband in Mexico, Anna and her two daughters arrived in Ottawa to claim asylum. She has 15 days to prepare the government forms, find a home, get her girls into school and hire a lawyer. She has one friend in Ottawa, who helps Anna to apply for legal aid. She is approved and given a list of local lawyers.

Her hearing must be within 45 days of her claim being referred to the Board (60 days from her arrival). When she meets her lawyer, she’s told to get more paperwork from Mexico to back up her claim that she was in danger there. She writes to the local police force and her family for help. Meanwhile, she is not entitled to work and has no money, so she applies for social assistance.

Her lawyer says she and her girls will need to go to Montreal for the hearing. The social assistance office won’t help with travel costs, and if she can’t go, her claim will be called “abandoned” with no appeal. Finally, she gets some work “under the table”, enough to pay for the bus fare. Still, the Board member in charge rejects her claim – the documents from Mexico didn’t arrive in time.

She has no right of appeal, because Canada has designated Mexico as a ‘safe’ country. She could seek ‘leave’ to have the Board’s decision reviewed by the Federal Court, but will need a Federal Court judge to give her a ‘stay of removal’ until the other application is heard. As her legal aid certificate only covered the hearing in Montreal, she must reapply for legal aid. Her lawyer says funding was recently cut that would have paid her to provide an opinion about the merits of the case to legal aid. As that program no longer exists, Anna would have to pay the lawyer.

The legal aid application is denied on the basis of “insufficient merit”. Anna and her girls are deported back to the situation they fled in Mexico.
However, some people had a good idea of what they would do when confronted with a legal problem:

“Generally, these are government matters; I would get in touch with the provincial government responsible. I would want to make sure my voice was heard, and whoever I talked to was the correct individual.” Middle aged man, Windsor

“I would try to get someone to mediate the problem and come to a win-win situation.” Middle aged woman, London

“I have prepaid legal expense insurance that I prepay monthly. I would just call, and they would get back to me within one business day.” Middle aged man, London

At the same time, many recognized that resources make the difference between access or lack of access to justice, and said this was unfair and unacceptable. The majority of people interviewed reported that they would be entirely lost as to what to do if they had a legal problem.

“If I had a justice problem? I wouldn’t know what to do.” Young woman, Saskatoon

“Where would I go? I don’t know. (long pause). My MP?” Middle aged man, Windsor

“I don’t think many people know where to go or what to do to get access to justice.” Middle aged man, Ottawa

“I would go to a lawyer, a free lawyer, I can’t afford a lawyer, and I would agree with him on the spot… If I had a problem, where would I go for help? The government of Canada.” Young man, London

“I would talk to my mother and get her opinion, and then I would call the police… I just know to call the police.” Young woman, London

People were also asked what justice should be, the ‘blue sky’ picture:

“Justice is ensuring everyone gets equal rights and benefits within the country no matter what race, gender, religion and sexual orientation.” Young man, Toronto

“Anyone in any circumstance should be treated fairly and equal to any other person.” Young man, Toronto

“It should be equally as important as our health care. You just don’t know when you could have a legal problem and need access to justice.” Young woman, Toronto

Everyone interviewed and consulted held high expectations of what accessible justice should be. Some assumed these ideals are already met, but most knew they are not.

What Unrepsented Litigants Tell Us

The justice system is not proficient at directly surveying client or user satisfaction with their experiences on an ongoing basis, and then learning from it. This is a significant shortfall. Strides have been made by several legal aid programs, public education and information services and governments when introducing recent access programs. New initiatives and pilot projects often have included a user satisfaction evaluation component. Several law societies have also recently conducted surveys on client satisfaction with legal services. Results of these surveys are generally positive; people often express satisfaction when asked about particular services or resources that they have used. But these surveys rarely measure the impact of services on outcomes or in meeting policy goals such as speedy resolution.

13 A 2010 Alberta Law Society study found that 91% of people who had recently retained a lawyer were satisfied with the ‘good cost value’ of the experience (presentation by Susan Billington, Policy and Program Counsel, Law Society of Alberta, to International Legal Ethics Conference, July 2012). The Ontario Civil Needs study also noted a widespread public perception that legal fees are prohibitively expensive, but also that 30% of the study’s target population with a civil legal problem found free service, and another 20% had paid less than $1000 for help.
Jill’s story

When Jill and her ex husband decided to get a divorce, she went to legal aid in Fredericton, NB. Jill was eligible for assistance, but was told there would be a long wait to meet the legal aid lawyer and another long wait after that for a court date. Jill didn’t have time to wait, so decided to stay with the lawyer who had helped her in the past, knew her case already and had fought hard for her. Meanwhile, her ex got a legal aid lawyer. The divorce took over three years and $30,000, as her ex contested every step of the proceedings and a long wait was involved to get back to court each time.

That wasn’t the end. Later, her ex stopped paying child support. Jill decided to represent herself, but the judge wouldn’t hear her without a lawyer. She went back to legal aid, and again was found to qualify financially. But, the province won’t help people proceeding under the federal Divorce Act rather than provincial laws. As she was divorced, Jill had no choice but to proceed under the Divorce Act. Her ex still had a legal aid lawyer: he was “grandfathered in” because he had help in the earlier proceedings.

Jill’s lawyer agreed to take the case, which now involved an application to reduce child support and change the custody agreement. The three children were refusing to see their father so he was seeking custody.

Some family members were able to help Jill, and she will have to repay them over time. But, Jill calls her experience with justice and the legal aid system a “let down.” She knew her ex had extra income from under the table jobs and had hidden his farm income and buildings by putting them in her son’s name, but how could she prove those things. She says someone other than a working mother making minimum wage needs to find out where the support payer is working, and ensure all income is disclosed.
Two recent in-depth studies of unrepresented litigants in courts in several provinces look at services and resources from a different perspective and paint a dramatically different picture. The Committee uses the term unrepresented litigants to refer to people who go to court without the benefit of legal counsel because the majority of these people would prefer to be represented but cannot access a lawyer’s services. The more common practice is to refer to this group as self-represented litigations (SRLs for short). In this report the two terms are used interchangeably. This section summarizes what these recent studies learned about the experience of unrepresented litigants. The next section reports more broadly on what we know about the increased number of unrepresented litigants and the reasons for this phenomenon.

In the first report, Drs. Rachel Birnbaum, Nicolas Bala, and Lorne Bertrand studied unrepresented litigants in family courts (Birnbaum Study). The authors combined four interrelated surveys: one of judges, two of family law lawyers in Ontario and Alberta, respectively; and one of family law litigants in Ontario. While each group had a different perception of the causes and consequences of being self-represented, there were some common themes.

Judges, lawyers and litigants were united in the belief that unrepresented litigants fare worse in court and experience poorer outcomes compared to those who have access to lawyers.

A majority of self-represented litigants (67%) reported that navigating the court system was difficult or very difficult. 49% believed the lack of a lawyer made the process slower or much slower, though a significant portion (31%) felt that lack of representation did not slow down resolution. Many believed that lawyers for the opposing party usually made problems for the self-represented in court worse than they need to be.

From the perspective of represented litigants, 72% reported that they expect a much better outcome as a result of having a lawyer, and many expected the court process takes less time with a lawyer than if they had been unrepresented. Comments from represented litigants about the court process and the value of having a lawyer included:

“There is a lot of information available for people to learn about the court system but reading all of that information is just too much. I might as well go to law school to learn all of these things. I am happy that I decided to get a lawyer.” [female]

“Custody of my children is an important matter and I would not trust myself if I had to be self-represented. My lawyer handles things for me and explains the system to me which is definitely easier.” [female]

(No significant differences were identified between male and female litigants on these issues.)

Judges express concerns about whether SRLs experience fair outcomes, including that they tend to be “unable to articulate their case” or “fail to address the issues that are probative”. In addition, judges commented that unrepresented litigants “are often overwhelmed by their emotions” and generally tend not to explore all possible scenarios. Both judges and lawyers expressed particular concerns about the inequalities experienced by SRLs who were victims of domestic violence.

There were greater distinctions in the survey responses about how well SRLs are treated by judges. Most lawyers (57% in Ontario and 77% in Alberta) believe that self-represented litigants are treated “very well” by the judiciary. They report their clients’ perception that judges generally tend to favour unrepresented litigants. However, only 14% of the self-represented and 9% of the represented litigants believe the self-represented are very well treated. On the other hand, only a relatively small percent of each group feel that self-represented litigants believe the self-represented are very well treated.

Winsome’s story

At 75 years of age, Winsome worked as a housecleaner for most of her adult life in the Yukon. She has lived alone since her husband died ten years ago and rarely sees her daughters. She owns the small home where she and her husband raised their children, and has a fixed income that just covers her monthly expenses. She saves what she can.

Winsome recently co-signed a car loan for her grandson, who needs a car to get to work and take his four kids to school and daycare. The used car dealer asked Winsome to sign some papers, and she assumed it must be OK, though she didn’t really understand what they said. The dealer and her grandson were in a hurry.

Now, her grandson is behind in his payments, and Winsome is told that if she doesn’t pay $2500 immediately, the car dealership will repossess the car and “commence proceedings” to sell her home to get the money owed. Her grandson promises it won’t happen again. Her daughters have their own financial stresses and tell her not to pay and hope for the best.

Winsome doesn’t know who to call. Her friends say it costs hundreds of dollars just for a lawyer to write a letter. One friend gives her a website address that she says will help, but Winsome has never operated a computer. She has a toll free number for legal information, but after Winsome waits a long time, she doesn’t understand what the person tells her to do. She is embarrassed to ask again. In the end, she writes a cheque for $2500 and mails it to the company. She is left with about $500 in her savings account and is terrified this will happen again.
Some of the comments from those who were unrepresented and who expressed concerns about treatment by judges as a result of not having a lawyer include:

“Judges can be very disrespectful to litigants who do not have lawyers. For example, they raise their voice and use rude names. I was so surprised that a judge was allowed to call me a name.” [male]

“I hope they [judges] do [treat us fairly] but I don’t know. ... they [judges] treat them [self-represented] differently cause don’t all lawyers know each other and the judges?” [male]

“It seems to depend on the judge. Some judges are friends with some lawyers, and if they are friends with that lawyer, they’ll be gentler with their client.” [male]

“It’s about the judge’s character, not about you. That’s what I learned early on, to not take things personally cause otherwise you will go crazy.” [female]

Some comments from represented litigants reflected similar perceptions about the treatment of the self-represented by judges, which may have influenced their decisions to seek representation:

“...probably not treated too well. My friend was in court before and she didn’t have [a] lawyer and she’s the one who told me to get one, so maybe she felt disadvantaged.” [female]

“I have previous experiences as self-rep, judge did not listen to me.” [female]

The Birnbaum study also found that unrepresented litigants reported that available self-help materials had limited value. Those surveyed recognized that many family litigants did not have the education or literacy skills to benefit from these materials and that some had disabilities that prevented them from using them.\(^\text{15}\)

The second study led by Dr. Julie Macfarlane of the University of Windsor Faculty of Law (Macfarlane study) is a scathing indictment of the justice system, and critically important, if uncomfortable, reading for all judges, justice system personnel and the legal profession.\(^\text{16}\)

The study involved interviews with over 250 individual SRLs. Participants were broadly representative of the general population. Most were older, had some post-secondary education and an annual income of under $50,000. Over 60% of those interviewed were appearing in court on family law matters, 18% on other civil matters and 13% on small claims matters. More than half the SRLs started with counsel but were unrepresented at the time of the interview (almost always for financial reasons). Over 100 interviews were also conducted with counter staff at court registries, clerks (and some managers) at the courthouses, staff at court programs serving SRLs and duty counsel.

The study details what Macfarlane refers to as the ‘arc’ of the SRL experience: from optimism to disillusionment, and from bad to worse. She includes some telling quotes from the SRLs surveyed:

“No more fairy tales about having access to a justice system.”

“I am here because I have no other option. I am just a mom, trying to figure this out. It was so complex, daunting, intimidating.”

“I didn’t think that it would come down like a deck of cards. It’s an extremely sharp game… I became a bundle of nerves.”

Monique’s story

Monique separated from her husband, a difficult controlling man with bipolar disorder, in 2006. She was relieved when he left, and could not face negotiating with him to get a divorce. The bills continued to come in – credit cards, lines of credit and the mortgage. Her husband provided no financial support. As a 66 year old accounting clerk in Montreal, Monique struggles to pay the bills.

In 2010, Monique borrowed $1000 from her daughter to see a lawyer for a divorce, but after the initial consultation, she did not follow up. She slipped into a depression and had to push herself to get through each day. She also feared what would happen if her husband was served with divorce papers.

Monique tried to keep up with the minimum monthly amounts required, borrowing from one credit card to cover the minimum payment on another. She also borrowed money from her adult children, though she found it embarrassing. By 2012, she was seriously in debt and behind in all payments.

A letter from her bank arrived, saying her mortgage was in arrears and they were going to foreclose. Monique and her son went back to the lawyer. The lawyer dealt with the bank and stopped the foreclosure. He assisted Monique in negotiating a deal with her husband and a separation agreement was signed. Monique found a bank that gave her a mortgage in her own name. But just before this was completed, a review of the property registry uncovered that her husband had been sued on a business debt in 2010 and a judgment was registered against the marital home for $25,000. Monique needs to start a court action to attempt to remove this from her house.

The whole thing seems insurmountable. Monique’s stress increased and her health declined. After seven years of struggling, she is no farther ahead. She has borrowed over $40,000 on credit lines and from family since the separation, trying to stave off bankruptcy. Her husband has since retired and his health is declining. She sits alone at home and cries, waiting for the next foreclosure notice.

“...as a person with a chronic illness it has been challenging to learn about court procedures and laws. I chose to represent myself because I am on a fixed income and can no longer afford counsel. I have spent all my life savings and more on a five-year divorce process.”

“When you read information on the Internet and then it refers you to something else – which refers you to something else – by this time you are overwhelmed. It is endless mayhem.”

Most participants in this study had distressing experiences at legal hearings and felt they had been poorly treated by judges and opposing lawyers. They reported feeling embarrassed and humiliated and that they were the targets of an overwhelming bias. It is important to recognize that these perspectives are one-sided. In the Birnbaum Study, the authors point out that it is difficult to assess the validity of these concerns and some SRLs engage in inappropriate conduct, requiring strong direction from the court, or may be overwhelmed and misunderstand what has happened. While it is important to keep these cautions in mind, they cannot be used to discount these negative experiences or as a reason to ignore these widespread concerns. Both Birnbaum and Macfarlane studies underscore the importance of including all voices, particularly those who come to the justice system for help, in addressing access to justice issues.

The main findings of Macfarlane’s research include:

- Some SRLs began with a reasonable sense of confidence; others began with trepidation.

However within a short time almost all the SRL respondents became disillusioned, frustrated, and in some cases overwhelmed by the complexity of their case and the amount of time it was consuming.

- While online court forms appear to offer the prospect of enhanced access to justice, many forms are complex and difficult to complete, and SRLs often find they have made mistakes and omissions.

- There has been some progress towards developing user-friendly and simplified court forms, but far too little.

- A law student [employed by the researcher] tried to apply for a divorce in the three provinces and found that even with legal training, the forms were confusing, contained terminology she did not understand, and required an enormous amount of work and concentration.

- Court guides are an important step to assist SRL’s to complete forms and understand court procedure but are too often written in a confusing and complex manner.

- SRLs who anticipated that the proliferation of on-line resources would enable them to represent themselves successfully became disillusioned and disappointed once they tried to work with what is presently available on-line. On-line resources often require some level of understanding and knowledge to make the best use of them.

- The study data also shows that no matter how comprehensive and user-friendly (standards we are far from meeting), on-line resources are insufficient to meet SRL needs for face-to-face orientation, education and other support. Enhanced online technologies can be an important component of SRL programming – for example sites developed specifically for SRL’s using interactive technology – but cannot provide a complete service.

- Staff working on the court counters and information services are asked to distinguish between offering legal information and advice. Both SRLs and court staff consistently complain about this distinction, at best unclear and at worst practically unworkable. The present situation places an unfair burden on court staff required to make constant determinations of how much information they can provide to frustrated SRLs.

This leads to inconsistent applications and creates a barrier between SRLs and certain basic information if construed as ‘legal advice’.

• Court and agency staff described an almost identical set of frustrations and challenges as SRL respondents. They also mirrored the primary frustrations and challenges of the SRLs. Court and agency staff work under enormous pressure in dealing with the growing SRL population and constantly changing court forms and procedures. These are very stressful jobs, for which they are often poorly trained and remunerated.

• Service providers universally recognized the frustrations of SRLs as a source of pressure on the justice system in general, and on court staff and judicial officers in particular.

Macfarlane’s study is a call to action. It details the serious implications of SRLs’ experience in attempting to access the justice system with inadequate information, assistance, representation and accommodation by the court system. These implications include: serious personal health issues, financial consequences (including giving up work to prepare for their court case or interference with their employment), social isolation due to the toll of navigating the justice system and failing faith in the justice system.18

She concludes that it is difficult to overstate the “depth of skepticism” about the justice system resulting from the direct experiences of SRLs. While accepting that “some of the most extreme reactions border on the paranoid”, on the whole SRLs appraise their experience in a rational and balanced way in concluding that the justice system is “broken”.19

What We Know and Don’t Know about Access to Justice

We have little hard data about Canada’s justice system – especially relative to what we know about our healthcare and education systems. Much of what we do know about the system is anecdotal – descriptions rather than measurements.

Canada’s justice system: how does it measure up? Good intentions, usually, some promising reforms. But too many people still can’t enforce basic rights.

An international surge in empirical research on the prevalence of civil justice problems, unmet legal need, and their impact on people’s lives provides an important knowledge foundation. But we still know relatively little about what works to increase access to justice and how and why it does. Gaps in our knowledge hinder our progress in achieving equal access to justice.

In this section, the Committee draws together available data to provide a patchwork answer about the dimensions of access to justice problems in Canada. It is not comprehensive but rather a partial picture based on indicia of barriers.

Prevalence of Civil Legal Problems and Patterns of Resolution

The biggest evolution in our knowledge base comes from large scale civil legal problem surveys by Dr. Ab Currie and his international colleagues. These surveys tell us about the high incidence of civil legal problems and the fact that they have a “pervasive and invasive presence in the lives of many”. The results are similar over time and in various countries.

Over three years, about 45% of Canadians will experience a justiciable event, meaning that over the course of a lifetime almost everyone will confront such a problem. Dame Hazel Genn, a pioneer in this field, defines a justiciable event as: a matter experienced by a respondent which raised legal issues whether or not it was recognized by the respondent as being “legal” and whether any action taken by the respondent to deal with the event involved the use of any part of the civil justice system.

Civil legal needs arise frequently, touch on fundamental issues and can range from creating minor inconvenience to great personal hardship. The disruption caused by unresolved legal problems is significant and can cause cascading problems for individuals and families.

These surveys also draw an important link between unresolved legal problems and issues of health, social welfare and economic well-being, social exclusion and poverty. In addition to fostering problems in non-legal areas of life, people who experience one legal problem are much more likely to experience more than one, and this is especially true for people living on low incomes and conditions of disadvantage, as the stories in this section so vividly illustrate.

Vulnerable groups generally have more contact with the law than others. A broad-scale study by the Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales found that 22% of people have 85% of legal problems. Canadian studies have made the same findings: legal problems tend to ‘cluster’, multiply, and have an additive effect and this pattern of cascading problems disproportionately impacts people living in marginalized conditions. For every additional problem experienced the probability of experiencing more problems increases.

The surveys also provide an overview of the steps people take or do not take to deal with civil legal problems. Both the experience of legal problems and patterns of resolution are different for different

Dave’s story

Dave has two children, aged 7 and 5. Their mother, his common-law spouse Mona, aged 26, has not completed high school nor held a job and has had a drug addiction for many years. She kept telling Dave that she quit, but he didn’t believe her. Dave works a full-time job in Dartmouth. He had someone in the apartment building keeping a watch on his family, he came home on his lunch hours, and was with the children every weekend while Mona stayed out late. He bought the groceries, cooked the meals and cleaned the house. He knew she wasn’t capable of caring for the children alone.

One Friday, Dave refused to give Mona more money for partying, and she told him to leave. On Monday, she went to legal aid in Halifax and got a lawyer. She said she was the primary caregiver and wanted to claim custody of both children. Dave wanted legal advice but could not afford the $5000 retainer charged by most law firms.

He was rejected at legal aid because he earned too much money. Legal aid gave him some pamphlets.

Dave was devastated when he was served with the papers. He approached Mona to talk about a custody agreement, but she knew she would get child support and the child tax benefit if she had custody. Dave raised his voice in frustration and Mona called the police, claiming he was threatening her. Dave spent the night in jail, and was released on the condition that he have no contact with Mona. That means he cannot arrange access except through the legal aid lawyer. It takes days to coordinate a visit, and even then Mona cancels about 50% of the time.

Working 50 hours a week in construction, Dave now spends his nights trying to figure out how to represent himself. He reads the materials from legal aid and talks to friends but he is exhausted and can’t figure this out. He can’t sleep, and he is very scared for himself and for his children.
groups in society, between low income and middle income people.

Most justiciable problems are resolved outside the formal justice system. While positive outcomes can certainly be achieved outside the justice system, it is important to a fair negotiated result that the system be perceived as available and accessible to all parties to get the help they need and enforce their rights. In contrast, the justice system is currently poorly understood or perceived to be inaccessible by many people, and this perception in itself can be seen as a barrier to access. Vulnerable groups in particular may not respond to problems because of perceived or actual barriers to getting help, and research has shown that legal assistance results in better outcomes.25

The surveys identify other barriers to finding solutions to civil legal problems, including:

- the complexities of the legal system;
- the qualification process for legal aid;
- too little legal aid coverage for civil legal problems;
- lack of knowledge about the legal system and resources available to support individuals, especially knowledge regarding how to access legal aid or affordable legal services and information;
- fear of becoming involved in the legal system, particularly for those who had previous experience with the civil or criminal legal system;
- the stress of pursuing resolution of legal problems;
- concerns about damaging relationships;
- being intimidated by the court system and generally afraid to take action;
- embarrassment and fear of stigmatization for having a legal problem; and
- fear of loss of privacy.26

26 Summary of findings of studies at supra note 12.

Differential Impact of Access Denied

Socially excluded groups are more vulnerable and this vulnerability compounds the effects of unresolved legal problems. It also makes it more challenging to navigate the justice system.

Dr. Patricia Hughes of the Law Commission of Ontario points out that access to justice may be restricted because of geographic factors, institutional limitations, racial, class and gender biases, cultural differences and economic factors. Not only are people living in disadvantaged conditions or socially excluded groups more vulnerable to experiencing multiple legal problems, they are less likely to take action to resolve these problems, less capable of handling their problems alone and more likely to suffer a variety of adverse consequences that may well further entrench their social exclusion.

Individuals and families living on low incomes often experience additional problems that make finding the time and energy to deal with legal issues even more of a hurdle:

- People in poverty who lack services often have legal needs on top of other needs. Even if services could meet the legal needs, the client may not return because their legal needs get subsumed by other needs – accommodation, mental health. Unless other needs are met, legal needs will not be met.27

Specific communities have been identified as facing particular barriers in accessing the legal assistance they require to deal effectively with their civil legal problems. Generally, people living in poverty have lower levels of education and literacy. They disproportionately experience physical and mental health and addiction issues, or have experienced significant trauma in their lives compared to people living at higher income levels. According to British Columbia’s Legal Services Society report, Making Justice Work:

Legal aid clients are among the most marginalized citizens. They lack the financial

Arthur’s story

A while after their marriage ended, Arthur and his ex-wife stopped adjusting the child support for their three children every year. Arthur knew his ex-wife was remarried to a doctor and was comfortable financially. But, when the first child was ready to go to university, his ex-wife’s lawyer served him with papers, demanding money for university expenses and retroactive support increases for the past three years.

Arthur runs his own business in Winnipeg and makes about $60,000 a year. He had expected his share of university expenses to be about $10,000 a year per child, and didn’t want to pay more for legal fees. A child support variation would not be more complicated than running his own business successfully, he thought.

He figured out which forms to complete, but called the courthouse with one question. The clerk said he could not provide legal advice, but gave Arthur an internet site to research. He finished the defence at 2am the day it was due.

He had neglected his business working on the case, and felt relieved to finally deliver the papers to the courthouse for filing. The clerk passed it back to him, saying he’d “not complied with the rules of court”. When Arthur asked what was wrong, the clerk said he could not provide legal advice. As a taxpayer, Arthur was furious that the clerk would not help him. He looked on the website again, but couldn’t find the answer. He did find a toll free number, and after 45 minutes on hold, he spoke with the volunteer lawyer. He had failed to attach his tax returns.

Once the documents were filed, Arthur started educating himself on the Child Support Guidelines to see what he should expect to pay. His friends all had conflicting advice, so that wasn’t helpful. He read case law he found online but didn’t know what he was looking for, exactly. He missed the HST filing deadline for his company.

Arthur arrived at the courthouse, exhausted and nervous. His ex-wife’s lawyer arrived and spoke to him before the judge came in. Soon he realized that they were talking about a settlement of the issues. Arthur had no idea whether the deal proposed was good or bad for him but he was overwhelmed. He took the deal.
means to effectively access the justice system when their families, freedom, or security are at risk. Almost 70% have not graduated from high school, and many struggle with basic literacy. Others face linguistic or cultural barriers. Over 25% are Aboriginal; in some communities, this rises to 80%.28 The Legal Australia-Wide Survey (LAW Survey), described as the most comprehensive quantitative assessment of legal needs ever conducted in Australia, found that “65% of legal problems were experienced by just 9% of the respondents, and 85% of problems were experienced by 22% of respondents.”29 Specifically, people with disabilities and single parents were twice as likely as other respondents to experience legal problems. Unemployed people and people in poor housing were also especially impacted. Aboriginal people were more likely to experience compounded problems, involving government, health issues and rights related problems.30

The Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project looked at the unmet legal needs of people earning less than $20,000 per year, and found a disproportionate number of women (62%) were impacted; most often single, divorced or widowed. They also found disproportionate representation from equality-seeking communities, particularly people with disabilities. The population was more likely to be unemployed, retired or receiving disability benefits – and almost half were receiving income assistance. The conclusion was that “the poorest and most vulnerable Ontarians experience more frequent and more complex and interrelated civil legal problems.”31

Private Market Legal Services

The research on civil legal needs demonstrates that many people do not use legal avenues to deal with justiciable problems and only a small minority turn to lawyers. The reasons are complex, including both the perceived and actual cost of a lawyer’s services and a tendency to view problems as something that ‘just happens’, rather than as legal problems.32 This is an area of active research.

We know little about supply and demand in the legal market for personal legal services. US legal scholar Gillian Hadfield recently noted that the legal marketplace for individuals is poorly documented – meaning it is difficult to understand how well or poorly this marketplace resembles a properly-functioning market.33 We cannot provide accurate figures for the dollar value of this part of the legal market, the average amounts spent by consumers of legal services, or the amounts earned by lawyers in a comprehensive way.

Surveys on private-market legal services conducted by several Canadian law societies have come to consistent results. The main problem people identify in accessing legal assistance is perceived or actual cost. At the same time, studies show that having legal assistance generally results in better outcomes for the people involved.34

One survey found that one quarter of those who resolved their issue alone felt they would have achieved a better outcome had they used a lawyer. One half of respondents, however, felt it would have made no difference, while 16% thought they would have a worse outcome. The main reasons given for hiring a lawyer were that the legal issues were too complex to handle alone and a lawyer would help to achieve a better result.

While complaints about lawyers’ fees are often heard, the studies show that clients who have actually retained counsel are generally satisfied, both with the service received and the amount they paid.35

Another important trend is that people want more active involvement in the management, strategy and decision making about their legal matters, and more certainty in terms of cost. People seek legal information to enable them to make more informed choices, but often get advice from friends and family, rather than legal professionals.

There is also a movement away from ‘all or nothing’ lawyering, with clients seeking legal advice and assistance for parts of their legal problems rather than following the traditional full representation model. Lawyers are responding through unbundled legal services, alternative billing arrangements, specialized law firms, and in other ways, but significant gaps in private market services remain and contribute to unequal justice. The two current CBA initiatives (Equal Justice and Legal Futures) are considering these means of providing legal services, along with related concepts like preventative lawyering, use of technology in dispute resolution and non-lawyer providers of legal services, as potential innovations for increasing access to justice.

Public Legal Services

Publicly funded legal services are provided by legal aid plans in each province and territory, but plans cannot meet current demands for legal help. There are huge regional disparities in who can access legal aid based on financial eligibility, the types of legal matters covered, and the amount and type of legal assistance and representation provided. One illustration of these disparities is that the national average annual per capita funding for legal aid (both criminal and civil matters) is $16.21, but it ranges from only $10.32 in one province to close to $30 in another.36

In some jurisdictions, there is no legal aid (beyond information) for many civil legal problems that affect areas of vital interest, such as housing. Some legal aid services such as public legal information are generally available to all, but most assistance and representation is available only on the basis of means testing. Often, an individual or family has to be receiving social assistance or earning just above this threshold to qualify for legal aid. Currently in Alberta, even recipients of Assured Income for the Severally Handicapped are ineligible for legal aid. People working full time for minimum wage qualify for legal aid only in a few provinces. The Barreau du Québec implemented an advocacy campaign to raise eligibility rates so that those earning minimum wage qualify for services, and Québec has recently announced a significant increase in eligibility levels.37

At the Summit, Nye Thomas, Director General, Policy and Strategic Research at Legal Aid Ontario (LAO) noted that LAO offers a broad range of legal aid programs and covers a range of essential legal issues, but has a lower eligibility threshold than all legal aid standards in Canada and the US. In a recent study, LAO analyzed its financial eligibility guidelines against Statistic Canada’s Low income Measure (LIM) – a common measure of poverty in Canada. They found a wide and growing gap between LAO financial eligibility and LIM in Ontario. Today, a single person earning more than $208 per week would not qualify for legal aid representation in Ontario. The impact of this gap has been significant. Since 1996, all demographic groups have lost ground relative to LIM. Fewer than 7% of all Ontarians are currently eligible for full representation legal aid, even though more than 16% live below the LIM.38 LAO estimates approximately 1 million fewer Ontarians are financially eligible for a legal aid certificate today than in 1996. This means more hardship, less access to justice, more court delays, more court ordered counsel and more unrepresented litigants. Absent corrective action, things will get worse. Other provinces have more generous eligibility guidelines but ration legal aid by providing it in a smaller range of legal matters.

The current inadequacy of civil legal aid is largely attributable to underfunding. Although there has been some increased funding for legal aid in the past five years, a longer range perspective shows a 20% overall decrease from the pre-1994 spending on civil legal aid.\textsuperscript{39} This trend is illustrated in Chart 1: Civil legal aid spending per capita, 1994-2012. In 1994-1995, governments spent $11.37 on a per capita basis, declining to a low of $7.89 in 2007-2008 and rebounding slightly in 2011-2012 to $8.96.

Chart 1: Civil legal aid spending per capita, 1994-2012\textsuperscript{40}

The reduction in legal aid funding and its particular impact on non-criminal matters is illustrated in Chart 2: Approved applications for civil legal aid, 1992-2012. Over two decades, the number of approved civil legal aid applications was reduced to a third: in 1992-1993, there were almost 18 approved applications for every 1000 Canadian residents; by 2011-2011 this number hovered just over six for every 1000 people. This represents a 65.7% decline.

Chart 2: Approved applications for civil legal aid, 1992-2012\textsuperscript{41}

One major change is that the federal government has gradually reduced contributions to criminal legal aid from a high of 50-50 sharing until 1995, to now contributing about 20-30% of the cost. At the same time, the federal government discontinued dedicated funding for civil legal aid in 1995. Direct per capita spending by the federal government on criminal legal aid is illustrated in Chart 3, Federal contributions to legal aid plans.

Chart 3: Federal contribution to legal aid plans (criminal legal aid) (per capita, 2002 constant dollars)\textsuperscript{42}

The next chart illustrates rising provincial and territorial spending on legal aid over the same period, for both criminal and civil matters. Any federal contribution to the provinces for civil legal aid is contained in a global transfer (first called the \textsuperscript{40} “Current levels of expenditures and services are considerably lower than the historical high levels in the early to mid 1990’s. In 1994-1995 direct service expenditures on civil legal aid were $329,787,000. This was $11.37 per capita. In 2007-2008 per capita direct service expenditures had declined to $7.89 per capita ($259,946,000). Per capita direct service expenditures on civil legal aid increased to $8.96 in 2011-2012 ($309,022,000). This represents a 13.6% increase in per capita direct service expenditures over the recent five-year period. However, it reflects a 21.2% decline from the level of per capita direct service expenditure in 1994-1995.” \textit{Ibid.}

For that reason, it is impossible to say what, if any, federal contribution actually goes to civil legal aid. Provincial and territorial Ministers of Justice have recently challenged the existence of a federal contribution for civil legal aid in the Canada Social Transfer, and called for additional dedicated funding.\textsuperscript{13}

Chart 4: Provincial/territorial contribution to legal aid plans (criminal/civil legal aid) (per capita, 2002 constant dollars)\textsuperscript{43}

The second important change is that spending on criminal legal aid, some aspects of which have been deemed to be constitutionally required by Canadian courts, accounts for an increasing proportion of overall spending. Of twelve legal aid plans that provided information to StatsCan, nine spent more on criminal matters than on civil matters in 2011/2012. The proportion spent on criminal matters ranged from 52\% for New Brunswick to 71\% for Saskatchewan.\textsuperscript{45} Of the remaining three jurisdictions, Prince Edward Island and Québec allocated 45 and 40\% of direct expenditures to criminal matters, respectively, and Ontario 37\%. Chart 5 compares the 2011/12 figures for direct expenditures on criminal legal aid compared to civil legal aid, as a percentage of total plan expenditures.

Chart 5: Regional legal aid spending (criminal/civil)\textsuperscript{44} 2011-2012

Further, spending on legal aid has not kept pace relative to health care and education. In his 2008 study in Ontario, Professor Michael Trebilcock used public accounts data over a decade to demonstrate that while health and education spending had risen 33\% and 20\% respectively from 1996-2006, legal aid spending over the same period decreased by 9.7\%. This trend is illustrated in Chart 6: Ontario Spending on Health, Education and Legal Aid, 1996-2006. There has been some improvement in Ontario’s spending on legal aid since 2006, but comparative data is not available for other periods or in other jurisdictions.

The reduction in federal spending overall, increased complexity in the substantive law and growing demands for criminal legal aid have placed pressure on legal aid providers to ration services – in a way often inconsistent with the general purpose and public policy values underlying the program.

Currie notes that the “vitality of the legal aid system is of vital importance.” Because the legal aid system is not as healthy as it once was, “it probably will not play the important, and perhaps key, role it might in the evolution of access to justice in Canada, without resources to repair the erosion” that has occurred since the early 1990s.

Exponential Growth of Pro Bono

The Committee defines pro bono work as free legal services provided to people or organizations who cannot otherwise afford them and that have a direct connection to filling unmet legal needs. The legal profession has always provided services to people with modest means on a charitable basis and indeed our legal aid system grew out of these pro bono roots.

The numbers of people assisted through pro bono efforts has grown exponentially. Increasingly institutionalized organizations have developed to act as a broker, taking applications from individuals and small organizations in need of legal assistance and linking them to lawyers willing to volunteer to help.

Pro Bono Students Canada was formed in 1996 and now operates out of 21 law schools across the country. In the last decade, formal pro bono organizations have been established in five provinces, providing an infrastructure and paid staff. (Ontario (Pro Bono Law Ontario); B.C. (Access Pro Bono); Alberta (Pro Bono Law Alberta)); Saskatchewan (Pro Bono Law Saskatchewan) and Québec (Pro Bono Québec). This growth in pro bono organizations is illustrated in Chart 7.

Pro bono organizations play an important role in promoting voluntary services: they develop programs that facilitate lawyer involvement, provide training and match lawyers willing to donate their time to clients with unmet legal needs. Once a client and lawyer are matched, the file might proceed as any other regular paying client file would, or the lawyer or organization might offer assistance with only certain aspects of the file or provide referrals, legal information or self-help materials.

Many pro bono organizations can be more flexible as to who qualifies for help than legal aid programs. The organizations supply administrative support, an intake and screening process to ensure clients meet established financial criteria and need the type of assistance offered by the organization, and a roster of volunteer lawyers to call on as needed, or who regularly attend at a designated location.

As with so many aspects of the access to justice landscape in Canada, there are few firm statistics on the number of lawyers who provide pro bono services, people helped or the value of this contribution. Several law societies collect statistics on pro bono contributions from their members, but reporting that information is optional for lawyers. Anecdotally, most pro bono organizations report that they cannot keep pace with growing demand. Many pro bono organizers describe how quickly their services become oversubscribed, finding it impossible to keep up. The exponential growth in the number of people and matters aided by pro bono lawyers is illustrated in Chart 8, based on information provided by the organizations that have begun to collect comparable data.

48 Currie, supra note 39.
49 Ibid.
There is a growing schism in the profession about pro bono work, between those who believe that lawyers should have a mandatory obligation to donate legal services and those who oppose this trend. Adam Dodek of the University of Ottawa (and member of the CBA Legal Futures Initiative’s Ethics and Regulatory Issues Team) recently wrote:

Unfortunately, no Canadian law societies or bar associations have any rules imposing an ethical let alone a regulatory obligation on Canadian lawyers to provide legal services to those who cannot afford them. The CBA’s Code of Professional Conduct rather meekly states that Lawyers should make legal services available to the public in an efficient and convenient manner that will command respect and confidence, and by means that are compatible with the integrity, independence and effectiveness of the profession.

(This is in chapter 14 on “Advertising, Solicitation and Making Legal Services Available”).

The Federation of Law Societies of Canada does no better. Its now-completed Model Code of Conduct states at Rule 3.01(1) that “A lawyer must make legal services available to the public efficiently and conveniently and, subject to rule 3.01(2), may offer legal services to a prospective client by any means.” The commentary states:

As a matter of access to justice, it is in keeping with the best traditions of the legal profession to provide services pro bono and to reduce or waive a fee when there is hardship or poverty or the client or prospective client would otherwise be deprived of adequate legal advice or representation. The Law Society encourages lawyers to provide public interest legal services and to support organizations that provide services to persons of limited means.

However, unmet legal need and the demand for legal services in Canada far exceeds availability and what can reasonably be provided on a charitable basis. Some question the sustainability of increased dependence on volunteerism by the profession. More fundamentally, the increased emphasis on pro bono services as a solution to the access to justice crisis is seen by some to discourage facing the fundamental inadequacies of our justice system. From this end of the spectrum of views regarding pro bono, the profession’s work in the public good “does nothing to ensure that there is a healthy public commitment” to access to justice, particularly to the disadvantaged, and in fact it can be seen as letting “the government off the hook too easily.”

A distinguished Ontario practitioner, well known for his contributions of low-rate or pro bono services, likened pro bono work to a sort of legal food bank: pro bono services alleviate hunger for some on a daily or monthly basis, but it absorbs the energy of those who provide these so that they have little energy left for changing the underlying conditions that create the hunger.

Mary Eberts reference to Andrew Orkin in “Lawyers Feed the Hungry”, note 52.
There are many unresolved questions about the extent to which unmet legal needs can reasonably be addressed by pro bono efforts, and the extent to which those efforts are the profession’s responsibility.53

Unrepresented Litigants

Perhaps the most obvious consequence of the gap between the prevalence of legal problems and inadequacies in the availability of public and private legal services is the exponential growth in recent years of unrepresented and under-represented44 litigants in the courts. Unrepresented people are now so common place that we tend to quickly refer to them as ‘SRLs’ (self-represented litigants), despite the fact that the vast majority state that they would prefer to have access to counsel to assist them with their legal matter.

Historically, we did not keep track of unrepresented litigants and courts do so only inconsistently today. As a result, data on this phenomenon is still limited. Twenty years ago, best estimates are that less than 5% of litigants were not represented by counsel. Today anywhere from 10-80% of litigants are unrepresented, depending on the nature of the claim and the level of court. While provincial court family matters and small claims courts have the highest levels of unrepresented litigants, even the Supreme Court of Canada is experiencing this trend. One recent study estimates that 50% of family law litigants across Canada are unrepresented.55 Of the few longitudinal studies of unrepresented litigants, one from California’s Family Courts shows that in just over 30 years the percentage of unrepresented litigants went from 1% or less to 80% (see Chart 9). At least one international study has demonstrated a link between cuts to legal aid and the growth of unrepresented litigants.56

54 By “under-represented” we mean litigants who may have received some legal help short of full representation but require full representation for their matter.

“Sometimes abusive men want to be able to have direct contact with their partner.” [lawyer]

“Men more often believe they don’t need a lawyer. Women do not have the money.” [judge]

Concerns have been raised about a two-tier justice system – with unrepresented litigants getting less than their fair share. One unrepresented litigant put it this way:

Either lawyers should charge less, or there should be more legal aid. Something’s gotta give or they can’t say it’s really justice, right?

Unrepresented litigant from Macfarlane study (note 6)

Similarly, in large scale civil legal needs surveys, Currie found that although many respondents were able to resolve problems on their own and get on with their lives, “[m]any of the self-helpers achieve outcomes that they consider to be unfair and, among those, some feel, in retrospect, that some help would have produced a better outcome. Many people who do not resolve their problems feel that the situation is becoming worse.”

Unrepresented litigants’ perception that they do not receive fair outcomes is validated by empirical research. More than 200 US studies in a wide range of legal proceedings and matters have demonstrated that unrepresented parties lose significantly more often – and in a bigger way – than represented ones. Several studies of this question are now underway using the more rigorous methodology of randomized testing, and early results appear to substantiate the earlier research. Further, recent US studies show that unbundled legal services, where an unrepresented litigant has some assistance from a lawyer (for example the lawyer drafts the court documents but the litigant appears in court on his or her own), make little difference to outcome, although these limited services do contribute to procedural fairness.

These results indicate that professionals clearly believe that lack of representation makes settlement less likely, takes longer, and therefore implicitly increases the costs to the represented party as well as to the publicly funded justice system.

As noted above, Macfarlane found serious implications of the SRL experience, including health issues, financial consequences, social isolation and declining faith in the justice system generally.\footnote{Supra note 6 at 108-110.} Lack of representation or under-representation has a disproportionately negative effect on individuals living in marginalized conditions. Many reports and studies have shown the increasingly prevalent ‘self-help services’ are most effective for people with higher levels of literacy and comprehension, while people who face other barriers are less able to effectively use those tools to navigate the legal system.\footnote{See for example, Carol McEown, Civil Legal Needs Research Report (Vancouver: Law Foundation of BC, 2nd Edition, March 2009) at 30; Community Legal Education Ontario, Tapping the Community Voice: Looking at Family law Self-Help through an Access to Justice Lens – Themes and Recommended next Steps (Toronto: CLEO, September 2009) at 3.}

\section*{Courts and the Civil Justice System}

Access to legal services is one piece of the access to justice puzzle. Others include court structures, rules and procedures, administrative tribunals, alternatives to adjudication, and substantive law. Courts and tribunals across Canada face a range of challenges in providing equal access to justice, challenges too complex to sum up here. A scan of recent annual reports shows an ongoing concern in many courts and tribunals with delays and the growing length of proceedings,\footnote{See, for example, the following annual reports: Supreme Court of BC 2012 Annual Report at 24: \url{www.courts.gov.bc.ca/supreme_court/about_the_supreme_court/annual_reports/2012%20Annual%20Report.pdf} Alberta Court of Queen’s Bench Annual Report at 41: \url{www.albertacourts.ab.ca/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=q1Bq8QoSaIk%3D&tabid=92&mid=704} The Provincial Court of Manitoba 2010 Annual Report at 10, 17, 18: \url{www.manitobacourts.mb.ca/pdf/annual_report_2010-2011.pdf} Ontario Superior Court of Justice Annual Report at 25: \url{www.ontariocourts.ca/sci/en/reports/annualreport/10-12.pdf} Ontario Court of Justice Biennial Report 2008-2009: \url{www.ontariocourts.ca/ojc/p/publications/biennial-report-2008-2009.pdf}} despite concerted efforts toward reform over more than two decades.\textsuperscript{66}

Few justiciable problems are actually resolved through the formal justice system. More informal assisted dispute resolution processes, including mediation in, connected to and separate from court and tribunal processes, are available. While only a small fraction of civil matters are ultimately resolved by a court or tribunal, these institutions have a central and irreplaceable role in maintaining a legal framework for resolving disputes. Reaching equal justice requires the formal and informal aspects of the justice system – courts, tribunals and the broader civil justice system – to work together effectively.

Recent studies emphasize the importance of timely intervention and assistance as key to enhancing access, avoiding problems, achieving positive outcomes and saving money. Public legal education and information providers are leading the way, often relying on online resources as a gateway. This significant trend to provide more online information and tools is important and welcome, as it can reach many people regardless of income. However, it is less helpful to the almost 48% of Canadians\textsuperscript{67} who lack the literacy skills to make use of this type of information. As well, many people, especially those already living in situations of disadvantage, need ‘human help’ in tailoring information and tools to their own problems and to answer their questions.

Currently, courts and tribunals are engaged in an ongoing process of modernization to make their processes efficient and effective. In addition to expanding the range of dispute resolution processes, many courts are streamlining their work, in particular by integrating the principle of proportionality to civil procedures and using other mechanisms to simplify court processes. The National Action Committee Court Simplification Working Group report provides an overview of the current status of these reforms.\textsuperscript{68}

Overall, the justice system has not been subject to the same technological transformation as other institutions or sectors. A recent newspaper article highlighted the fact that technological transformation was actually “bypassing the justice system”.\textsuperscript{69} As one example, there is still a lack of widespread capacity for scheduling of court dates (motions and trials) online. Administrative tribunals have been more nimble than courts in using technology to become more accessible. While technology offers courts “mind-boggling” opportunities to address shortcomings and efficiency gaps, courts have been cautious in embracing this potential.\textsuperscript{70} This caution is at least in part for good reason. Technology is never neutral.\textsuperscript{71} Reforms must be measured for whether they actually advance meaningful access to justice and questions need to be answered. For example, a report on remote court appearances by phone or video prepared for the Association of Canadian Court Administrators/Canadian Center for Court Technology noted:

Such questions concern the availability and reliability of the technologies, how they are best used, whether justice would be compromised, whether the common law principle of confrontation can be upheld, how demeanour can be assessed, how the remote location is set up to be suitable for a court proceeding, whether the solemnity of the court can be preserved, and what costs are involved.\textsuperscript{72}

In the same vein, innovation has largely bypassed the justice system. Many factors contribute to this deficit, but one looms above all others: the civil justice system is an incoherent system likened by American scholar Rebecca Sandefur to a “body without a brain”. Less colorfully, it has been said that the justice system lacks a CEO. The justice system is a system of systems, each with its own diffuse leadership (levels of court, levels of government, professional bodies, service providers) and underdeveloped mechanisms for communication, cooperation and collaboration.

Our lack of capacity for innovation is illustrated in an approach to reform dominated by pilot projects, often with insufficient commitment to follow through on those that prove successful, let alone integrating learning from less successful ones into the process of trial and error needed for innovation. Pilot projects have become synonymous with disappointed expectations and “nothing reduces trust in a system more than disappointed expectation.”\textsuperscript{73} Reports have also emphasized how the existing judicial and legal culture itself can serve as a barrier to innovation in courts and the civil justice system.\textsuperscript{74}

International – How are we Doing?
The Chief Justice of Canada has galvanized the national agenda for access to justice, in part by highlighting Canada’s poor rating on international access to justice indicators. She has noted with dismay that the World Justice Project found that on civil justice, Canada ranked ninth out of 16 North American and Western European nations and 13th among the world’s high-income countries, just ahead of Estonia.\textsuperscript{75}

Two particular sub-factors contribute to Canada’s low ranking – delays in the resolution of civil matters and inadequate access to legal counsel

How Canada Ranks in the World on Access to Justice

9/12 in North America and Western Europe in 2011

13/29 of high income countries in 2012

54/66 in access to legal counsel (legal aid)

According to the 2011 World Justice Project report, one of Canada’s greatest weaknesses is in access to civil legal aid, especially for marginalized segments of the population. Here Canada ranks a shocking 54th in the world, well behind many countries with lower Gross Domestic Product (GDP). Somewhat surprisingly given the greater volubility of Canada’s public commitment to a social safety net, Canada even ranks behind the US, ranked at 50th in the world on this indicator.

Complexity in Law and Legal Process
The growing complexity of law and legal process, including vocabulary, protocols, procedures and institutions, contributes to an inaccessible justice system. This is perhaps the most evident contributor to barriers to equal justice. This complexity can be traced to various sources, including “the current state of rules of procedure, a multiplicity of practice directions, and the substantive law, which is often obscure and uncertain.”

The volume of legal materials continues to expand at an exponential rate. Court decisions are longer, legislation runs to hundreds of pages and regulations can be even thousands of pages long. This growing complexity is in large measure a reflection of modern society.

Law reform initiatives can help to increase accessibility. For example, the federal child support guidelines are credited with clarifying and simplifying the law. But, when we look back we can see that many other attempts to simplify legal process to save cost and time have had perverse results. While there have been some positive gains from certain reforms, generally procedures are as elaborate as ever and the cost of litigation continues to rise. One example given in our consultations is that recent changes in Alberta court rules for entry of orders actually make it more difficult, time consuming and expensive to resolve orders in dispute because of added demands on court staff (from judges or administration), resulting in greater delays and expense.

Proactive legal regimes such as consumer protection measures and regulatory oversight can contribute to equal justice by shifting the burden of enforcing legal rights and responsibilities and ensuring compliance to the regulator, rather than individual legal claims. In Canada, however, we have witnessed an opposite trend where administrative agencies, such as human rights and employment standards commissions originally intended to protect individuals through systemic enforcement and reliance, now rely almost exclusively on individuals to launch complaints. This move away from state enforcement of standards has led to rising demand for related legal assistance, undermining the original objective of preventing disputes and improving public protection.

The Australian strategic framework for access to justice recognizes this dimension of the access to justice issue, noting that “clearer laws” are critical. It sets out the following principle to guide reform:

Justice initiatives should reduce the net complexity of the justice system. For example, initiatives that create or alter rights, or give rise to decisions affecting rights, should include mechanisms to allow people to understand and exercise their rights.

Low Relative Spending on the Justice System

Spending on the justice system (excluding policing and corrections but including prosecutions, courts, victim and other justice services, and legal aid) is roughly 1% of government budgets. This 1% includes prosecution, court services and justice services such as legal aid and law reform.

Ratio of spending on health to justice: 40:1

Government spending on justice compared to overall government spending shows a trend: health and education funding is generally stable or gradually increases, while spending on justice is flat or declines from year to year. This is illustrated in the following charts, showing numbers from three sample provincial budgets (Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia) for justice, education and health over the same period.

Chart 10: Comparative government spending in 3 sample regions 2004-2010

At about the same time, federal government spending on prisons and policing has increased significantly, while Canada’s crime rate continued to decline. At the federal level, police services use more than half the justice budget (57.2%), followed by corrections (32.2%), courts (4.5%), prosecutions (3.5%) and legal aid (2.5%). The next chart sets out the percentage of public spending on justice in the same provinces (Nova Scotia, Ontario, British

So Much to Learn

This brief overview of what we know and don’t know about access to justice shows there are still many gaps in our knowledge and these gaps impact our capacity for reform.

Over the past two decades the justice system has become more adept at collecting baseline data, but the empirical basis for decision making is still extremely limited compared to what is known about health and education. The justice system has a long way to go in terms of what information is collected, how it is collected and how open it is. Overall we have become better at counting inputs and outputs, although not all of this data is open or transparent and there is no coordination across agencies to collect information in a manner that permits comparison. The Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges and the Association of Legal Aid Plans are both in the early stages of developing a protocol for standardized data collection. These commitments mark a welcome step in the right direction.

In 1996, the CBA identified the lack of court management information data as an obstacle. This information is essential for planning and evaluating access to justice initiatives and understanding the role of legal and justice services vis-à-vis other support services. But that is just the tip of the iceberg. We know little about the relative effectiveness and efficiency of various service delivery models, legal information, assistance and representation, or dispute resolution mechanisms across different types of legal matters, and how to match processes and legal services to the nature and intensity of the legal dispute. At this time, we do know that we fall far behind the health and education systems in our commitment to and capacity for evidence-based decision making. It contributes to our justice innovation deficit.

This lack of knowledge cannot be an excuse for inaction. Nor can we focus only on what is currently measured or easy to measure and ignore what cannot be measured or what we have chosen not to measure. It is detrimental and wrong-headed to suggest a lack of evidence justifies inaction, where it is obvious that action should be taken. Action is needed on many fronts, including developing and maintaining a stronger knowledge base.

The Case for Fundamental Change

What has gone wrong? The simple answer is that justice has been devalued. We see justice as a luxury that we can no longer afford, not as an integral part of our democracy charged with realizing opportunity and ensuring rights. The justice system has been starved of resources and all but paralyzed by lack of coordinated leadership and a tendency to focus on how justice institutions other than our own are contributing to the problem. As one person put it: “access to justice is even more undervalued in an already undervalued area.” Meaningful access to justice is a scarce resource and the mechanisms used to ration this scarce resource are largely hidden. The implications of this rationing are often also invisible.

In this section, the Committee considers arguments in support of a fundamental reexamination of the value we put on our justice system, and ways

Everyone Experiences Legal Problems

We live in a society regulated by law. Everyone’s lives are shaped by the law and everyone is likely to experience a legal problem at some point. This is not to say that everyone will engage with the formal justice system: many problems can and should be resolved in more informal ways. Still, we should know for certain that we – and those we care about – will have meaningful access to justice if and when we need it. Everyone is entitled to justice. This point needs to be a common thread of public discourse and individual understanding. Needing recourse to the justice system does not suggest a personal failure, any more than a health problem requiring access to the medical system does. It is a simple fact of 21st century life in a developed political economy: law “knits together the fabric of our society”. 84

Direct Relationship between the Courts and Democracy

The courts are one branch of government (in addition to the executive and the legislature) and an essential component of Canadian democracy. Courts are essential to a society committed to the rule of law, ensuring the peaceful resolution of disputes in a system where no individual or institution is above the law. The rule of law is two-dimensional: it shapes and protects the relationship between the individual and the court and between courts and other branches of government. In this way, access to justice is a democratic imperative. Basing arguments for justice innovation on democratic principles and the rule of law may seem abstract, as the straight line between those concepts to the services that may help an individual to resolve a legal problem is not immediately obvious. Yet this line is very real.

Growth in Poverty and Social Exclusion

The reality today is that not everyone has meaningful access to justice regardless of income. When social exclusion becomes more entrenched because a person cannot get the legal help needed to redress a wrong or enforce a right, the justice system aggregates, rather than mitigates, inequality. We know that poverty is deepening across Canada and it is changing the structure of society. 85

The growth in income disparity and social exclusion is a leading public policy concern and has specific ramifications for justice policy. In a section discussing the lack of access to legal services in Canada, the World Justice Project report notes that these issues “require attention from both policy makers and civil society to ensure that all people are able to benefit from the civil justice system.” A recent US study by the RAND Institute of Civil Justice similarly concluded, “[t]he policy ramifications of diminished legal aid, in terms of what the civil justice system actually accomplishes and whom it serves, present a troubling set of questions for society”. 86

Providing suitable legal advice and assistance can play a crucial role in helping people move out of some of the worst experiences of social exclusion.

84 Eberts, supra note 52.

85 See: www.cwp-csp.ca/poverty/just-the-facts/

I just wanted to say when I first started working in community people were poor. We were just poor. Today there are different types of poverty, not just that people are poor. I have young people that I work with. Young couples with children, where 20 years ago they would have been working middle class, and they’re not anymore. They’re homeless. They make enough money between the two of them to keep their kids fed and to be able to buy clothing for them and send them to school. But they don’t have money to pay rent. There’s no way that they can pull that kind of money. One of them gets minimum wage and the other one is making a bit more but there’s still not enough to cover. So there’s a whole new kind of poverty that’s becoming even more prevalent in the community.

Maria Campbell, Metis Elder, Envisioning Equal Justice Summit, April 2013

Timely intervention in a life crisis triggered by a problem with a legal component, like debt or homelessness, can make all the difference, preventing the situation from becoming more extreme. For these reasons, the UK National Action Plan on Social Inclusion (2003) gave access to justice similar priority to health-care and education, recognizing access to justice as a basic right and a vital element in policies that address social exclusion. Currie’s Canadian research highlights the relationship between legal problems and health problems, demonstrating a strong policy rationale for connecting access to justice policy with other public policy concerns. His findings also illustrate the ways that lack of access to justice reinforces social exclusion faced by certain groups in Canada, particularly people with disabilities.

Canadians have a strong commitment to equality, exemplified in domestic and international human rights commitments, and Canadian governments have an important role in offsetting income inequality. For example, the Canadian Institute for Health Information recently found that public health care alone reduces the income gap by 16%, as wealthier Canadians pay more in taxes than they reap in benefits. As stated by Hughes: “While responding to the needs of members of less advantaged communities matters if there is to be equal access to justice, a failure to achieve ‘equal justice’ also has implications for other aspects of people’s lives and inevitably therefore for society at large.”

Poor Public Policy

There are strong practical reasons for ensuring meaningful access to justice. Adequate representation leads to a smoother and more effective functioning of the system. When people receive appropriate assistance in reading and preparing documents and making arguments, it saves public money in the long run and results in better outcomes.

Justice degrades with delay: while the outcome may look the same when a resolution is finally reached or a decision rendered, the justice the person receives is not the same. The parties’ position or personal safety may be compromised and the damage may be irreparable. People whose legal issues are not resolved face ongoing difficulties. Problems spread to other areas of their lives, at significant individual and social cost. For example, a mother and children unable to get timely, effective assistance or an expedited court hearing to determine their right to support may eventually get the requested order and judgment, but that won’t cure the deprivations or repercussions suffered in the meantime. Further, since we know that people whose legal issues are unresolved face ongoing and escalating problems in different areas of their lives, at significant individual and social cost, society as a whole benefits from providing timely access to justice.

Empirical research shows a false dichotomy between focusing on “efficiency and effectiveness rather than equality and ideals.” Equal justice makes sense for both “the wallet and the heart.”

Costs of Inaccessible Justice

Studies are now demonstrating how unresolved legal problems and inadequate access to justice can be costly for both the individual and to society at large. For example, Macfarlane’s national SRL study notes some costs of inaccessibility in terms of stress and health effects, loss of income and loss of employment. Children can be secondarily affected if parents are not afforded the fair outcomes that they need. This may be obvious in child support or parenting cases, but is equally true when families with dependent children are at risk because of other unmet legal needs, such as those impacting housing or income issues. The costs and benefits of equal justice are also documented in reports prepared by the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice\(^{89}\) and others.\(^{90}\) However, we have as yet been unable to quantify the impact of these costs in Canada.

Other jurisdictions are further ahead. For example, one British study calculated that each legal problem reported to cause physical illness ultimately costs Britain’s National Health Service between £113-£528, depending on which service provider was used, or more if multiple providers were involved. Stress-related effects cost between £195-£2224 per patient, again depending of which service provider was used.\(^{91}\) Similarly, an Australian study found that providing legal aid at the committal stage of a criminal procedure would save the equivalent of three or four district court judges per year.\(^{92}\)

The Canadian Forum on Civil Justice is collaborating with a range of individuals and institutions on a five-year study to define the economic and social costs of justice. The study will develop methods to measure what our civil justice system costs, who it serves, whether it is meeting the needs of its users and the price of failing to do so. The project has two prongs: the costs of providing an accessible system and the costs of not providing an accessible system. The costs of justice system inaccessibility will be measured at four levels:

- individual (health, well-being, power, security, economics, education)
- private sector (business, lawyers, paralegals)
- government (justice system, health care system, other social services (housing, social welfare, policing, for example)), and
- civil society (rule of law, democracy, sustainability).

The results of these research projects are eagerly awaited. They will offer an in-depth understanding of the value of an accessible justice system and a convincing case for institutions and citizens to invest in access to justice.

Costs of Inaccessible Justice:

Return on Investment for Legal Aid Spending

In recent years, we have repeatedly heard that legal aid is not sustainable. But legal aid is our most important access to justice program. In addition to being a significant down payment on the promise of equal justice, funding for civil legal aid represents a good social and economic investment.

Synthesizing several studies on the economic benefits of civil legal aid, Dr. Laura Abel notes that it can actually save public money by reducing domestic violence, helping children leave foster care more quickly, reducing evictions and alleviating homelessness, protecting patient health and helping low-income people participate in federal safety-net programs.\(^\text{93}\)

A growing number of studies are contributing to a business case for adequately funding legal aid by actually quantifying the return on investment for legal aid dollars spent:

- A 2012 Australian study, Cost Benefit Analysis of Community Legal Centres (CLCs), finds that, on average, CLCs have a cost benefit ratio of 1:18. For every dollar spent by government they return a benefit to society that is 18 times the cost. To express this in dollar terms, if the average held constant for CLCs in Australia, the $47 million spent on the program nationally in 2009/10 would yield around $846 million of benefit to Australia.\(^\text{94}\)

- A PricewaterhouseCoopers study, also in Australia, found that every dollar spent on family law legal aid provided a $1.60 to $2.25 benefit to the overall justice system. “Legal aid demonstrably benefits those receiving legal aid support, those people and businesses they have contact with, the community more broadly and the efficiency of the legal system as a whole. Therefore there is a strong economic case for appropriately and adequately funded legal aid services, based on the magnitude of the quantitative and qualitative benefits that this funding can return to individuals, society and the government.”\(^\text{95}\)

- A 2009 Texas study found that “investment in legal aid services led to economic growth in the community by increasing jobs, reducing work days missed due to legal problems, creating more stable housing, resolving debt issues and stimulating business activity.” In fact, “for every direct dollar expended in the state for indigent civil legal aid services, the overall annual gains to the economy are found to be $7.42 in total spending, $3.52 in output (gross product), and $2.20 in personal income.” Reductions in legal aid spending, therefore, have a negative impact on spending and create an economic burden on the community.

- A 2011 UK Citizens’ Advice Bureau Report, Towards a business case for Legal Aid, found that for every pound of legal aid expenditures on housing advice, debt advice, employment benefits and income benefits advice, the state potentially saves between £2.34 and £8.80.

One British study approached this issue from the opposite perspective: how cuts to legal aid increase costs in other areas of public spending. In a 2011 report for the Law Society of England and Wales, Dr. Graham Cookson of the School of Social Science and Public Policy of King’s College London was asked to consider any “knock on” costs (unintended costs) because of significant cuts to legal aid, and the overall impact of those cuts on government budgets. His advice was that the cuts would involve such significant “knock on” costs that the promise of any cost savings should be reevaluated. He also noted significant areas where additional longer-term costs were likely, but were difficult to precisely evaluate.

Similarly, a British study on the effectiveness of legal aid in the asylum (refugee) context found that restrictions on the quality of legal aid as a cost savings measure resulted in higher costs overall: “poor quality work costs much more in the longer term to the public purse and in human terms to individual asylum seeker applicants.”

These studies from Australia, the UK and the US conclude that the average demonstrated social return on investment is that for every $1 of legal aid spending about $6 of public funds are saved elsewhere (a range from 1:2 to 1:18.)

Average Social Return on Investment from Legal Aid Spending
$1 = $6

US civil legal aid providers increasingly report the economic impact of their programs in concrete terms. Program impacts are quantified in millions of dollars, on an annual basis. The impacts measured include: income benefits and cost savings received by low income families, cost savings to taxpayers, economic impact of federal dollars flowing into local economies as an outcome of legal aid cases, increased tax revenue, and systemic changes resulting in savings for state residents. These reports also note additional economic impacts that while difficult to quantify are no less real, including for health care providers, court efficiencies, and for costs and losses to the state from homelessness and domestic violence.

Unfortunately no Canadian studies to date have quantified the economic impact of legal aid in this way. Several legal aid plans have reported in general terms the ways legal aid can save public funds. In 2012, the Law Foundation of British Columbia commissioned Yvon Dandurand and Michael Maschek to conduct a feasibility study on the economic impact of legal aid. They identified a number of promising areas for future research, proposing four studies on the impact of legal aid.

Why Tinkering is Insufficient

The civil justice system is too badly broken for a quick fix. People fall between the cracks at an unacceptable cost. Injustice is too deeply woven into the system’s very structure for piecemeal reforms to make much of a dent. It is unclear whether the myriad of ad hoc access to justice interventions currently proliferating outside an overarching strategic framework are actually helping. Individual interventions may work at cross-purposes and risk hindering progress by fostering complacency and diminishing support for more substantive reform. An excess willingness to compromise makes achieving the equal justice vision impossible.

Believing that we are doing something effective can reduce our perceptions of injustice, whether or not our beliefs are factually justified.

We need to abandon a “culture of martyrdom”; we need to stop trying to simply make do. It is time to reach for equal justice, not some limited vision based on a short term view of current constraints. The enormity of the challenge may seem paralyzing, but access to justice problems are not intractable, and committing to achievable reforms can be empowering. Change will not happen quickly, but every step along the right path, with a common vision and commitment to measure how effective each innovation has been in achieving that vision, can help. Missteps can be corrected when evidence shows a better way, but we should not waiver about the need to start walking, or the ultimate destination.

Envisioning Equal Justice
Finding the ‘Soul’ of Reform

At the Summit, Sam Muller of the Hague Institute for the Internationalisation of Law (HiiL) urged participants to consider the ‘soul’ of reform, that is to work toward a consensus on the animating purpose of our access to justice efforts. Agreeing on the ‘soul’ of reform would give us a shared focus and a measuring stick for progress, while allowing flexibility on how the animating principles are actually achieved in particular circumstances. It would also recognize that diverse approaches are needed and should be encouraged.

Improving access to justice is an ongoing project, and contemporary efforts date back to the 1960s. The focus of these efforts has changed over time, with succeeding waves of the access to justice movement. Early on, access to justice was seen as one prong of an agenda to build a more equitable society, joined with a focus on human rights and increased accountability of government institutions. This gave rise to the spectacular growth of administrative tribunals and legal aid, including community-based clinics. In the 1980s, the focus shifted away from institutional change to processes and procedures, with a renewed interest in alternative dispute resolution in both court and community settings. In the 1990s, the focus was more on court reform, with an emphasis on reducing costs, delays and complexity. And, the new millennium has ushered in an emphasis on cost efficiency and meeting budgetary targets, seemingly based on the general belief that as a society, we can no longer afford justice.

The emphasis on rationing civil justice has been linked to the steady rise in the cost of legal aid and the dramatic increase in spending on criminal justice. Some reforms of the 21st century have been more about eradicating barriers to the courts, though couched in the overall language of rationing access to justice. More recently, empirical research into unmet legal needs and their impact on people’s lives and society as a whole has begun to shift the discourse back to a focus on client needs, but the trend now is more towards problem-solving than based on the idea of a right to equal justice.

The earlier generations’ access to justice agendas were never finished, and they continue to motivate individual and institutional positions and reform priorities. This gives rise to distinct and sometimes conflicting goals for reform. The lack of clarity and agreement about the purpose (or ‘soul’) of reform is a key barrier to change and impedes progress. It also adds a layer of unintended, negative consequences to the process of reform.

Reaching agreement on the ‘soul’ of reform involves delineating the goal: a vision that is ambitious but possible. The Committee proposes a tangible vision of equal justice to guide reform:

An inclusive justice system requires that it be equally accessible to all, regardless of means, capacity or social situation. It requires six concrete commitments:

1. People – The system focuses on people’s needs, not those of justice system professionals and institutions.
2. Participation – The system empowers people. It builds people’s capacity to participate, by managing their own matters and having a voice.

in the system as a whole.

3. Prevention – The system focuses attention and resources on preventing legal problems, not just on resolving them after they arise.

4. Paths to justice – A coherent system involves several options and a continuum of services to arrive at a just result. People get the help they need at the earliest opportunity, and find the most direct route to justice.

5. Personalized – Access to justice is tailored to the individual and the situation, responding holistically to both legal and related non-legal dimensions, so that access is meaningful and effective.

6. Practices are evidence-based – The system encourages equal justice by ensuring justice institutions are ‘learning organizations’, committed to evidence-based best practices and ongoing innovation.

Equal and Inclusive Justice

It is hard to object to the goal of building a Canadian justice system that is equally accessible to all regardless of means, capacity or social situation. Equality, after all, is what the rule of law is all about. Despite this, there is a long way to go to ensure equality and inclusivity in practice.

At the Summit, Hughes reminded us that acknowledging diversity is not about including the ‘other’ but rather it is about all of us. The challenge is to approach the task of building an inclusive justice system not from a list of categories, like gender or Aboriginality, but based on people’s relationship to the justice system and their need for assistance in different situations. Maria Campbell also spoke about the importance of working across differences in a manner that builds trust and empowers, rather than erects or reinforces boundaries.

What’s the fix? Focus on users’ needs and how they need it. No one-size-fits-all solution for poor, middle class and distinct communities.

In this report, we highlight differences between the needs of the middle class and the needs of lower-income, poor and people living in marginalized conditions, as they are often not the same. While this approach oversimplifies the realities, it is a shorthand way of reminding us that individuals are socially-situated and that social situation relates to both the characteristics of the individuals and the complexity and extent of their legal needs. As such, many of the solutions to the crisis in access to justice for the middle class and the poor are distinct.

We need to continually question: who needs what kind of help in accessing justice? And what can be done to ensure that they can find it regardless of their particular characteristics and situation?

Dr. Ab Currie, the leading Canadian legal needs researcher, has shown that experiencing more than one form of disadvantage, say disability and remoteness, has an “additive effect”. Multiple disadvantage results in multiple problems in different areas of life, like health and employment, and legal issues themselves compound at an ever-increasing rate. These realities result in further entrenching social exclusion.

At the Summit, Geoff Mulherin, Executive Director of the Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales, provided a practical example of how paying attention to inclusivity will affect reform initiatives. He warned us to be careful about focusing too much on ‘early intervention’ – a current trend in Australia and Canada. The research by his foundation demonstrates that “many disadvantaged people will turn up late in the process, not early.” Focusing on early intervention is a positive direction for reform, but not when it has the perverse result of reinforcing barriers for people who need assistance the most. ‘Timely intervention’ is a more inclusive, more effective policy.

The Committee employs broad categories to distinguish between the legal needs of different segments within Canadian society, recognizing that these categories are imperfect and there are no hard and fast rules that separate the legal needs of various groups of people. They do however reflect differing means, capacities and social situations in a general way, and assist us to keep in mind significant differences in legal needs, the impact of unresolved legal problems, and problem-solving and dispute resolution behavior, so we can assess who is most likely to benefit from proposed innovations.

While “100% access is the only defensible ultimate goal”, the Committee recognizes that this will be challenging. To the extent that rationing justice must be done, and undoubtedly is done on a daily basis, how can it be done to mitigate rather than reinforce patterns of inequality? Getting to equal justice demands that we first focus on the people who are most disadvantaged by their social and economic situation.

Designing a People-Centered Justice System

Over time, our justice system has developed to reflect the needs, approaches and imperatives of courts, court administration, tribunals and the legal profession. Justice institutions are not alone in this tendency. It is common to the way many organizations and professions work, and is difficult to overcome. But the civil legal needs research has demonstrated how far removed this approach is from what people actually want, need and expect from their courts and justice system. The way legal services are delivered by the legal profession, the nature of court and tribunal proceedings, including procedural requirements and the language used, the complexities and the costs, all act as barriers limiting people’s opportunity to obtain justice.

A people-centred justice system will be easier to use, transparent and fair. It will ensure just outcomes so that people can go on with their lives and have confidence in the justice system. It will operate on the basis of reciprocity, actively transcending the standard ‘us-them’ divide between service provider and the user of services.

Participants in the Committee’s community consultations were clear that justice and equality are primary goals underpinning the law. When asked what they meant by ‘justice’, comments included:

“Fairness, equality and being held accountable.” Person with Disability, Toronto “Due consideration of all the facts and circumstances.” Man with mental disability, Toronto
“It makes it possible to fix the damage.” Youth, Montréal

The Committee summarizes the broad vision of the justice system gained from the consultations it held with people living in marginalized conditions this way:

Justice is inviolable. It ensures fairness and equality for all, and respect for all who come before it. Being accorded respect from a justice system means being heard and provided with an effective, meaningful outcome.

A justice system designed for the people using it will have strong linkages to other services. Legal issues are often experienced as part of a constellation of issues or problems, many that are not legal in nature.

When lawyers and judges talk about access to justice, we usually talk about law, justice systems and sometimes about how legal services and information are provided. Our vision is often limited by our own frame of reference. One of the most palpable and crucial findings of the Committee’s consultations, consistent with other broad based surveys, is that the public has a more holistic view of justice.

The community consultations made it clear that people’s legal issues are intimately interwoven with other social and personal issues in their lives. This can flow in two directions. In one sense, what is happening in the justice system has a ripple effect on their lives, like the single mother experiencing excessive delay in family court who fears she may lose her home as a result. In another sense, what is happening in people’s lives and households can create legal problems and promote involvement in the legal system, for example, when a youth flees a troubled home life to become easy prey for gangs on the street. These realities illustrate the link between prevention and integration.

A Participatory Justice System
The only way to ensure a people-centred justice system is to ensure that members of the public are engaged in its oversight. Many also want to be active participants in preventing and resolving legal problems. The goal is to move away from traditional approaches that set lawyers and courts apart, denigrating any non-professional knowledge.

Enhanced public accountability and participation depends upon informed and capable citizens and disputants or litigants. Strong commitments and resources must be devoted to building people’s individual legal capabilities.

A Standard for Meaningful Access to Justice
A meaningful access to justice standard should guide our reform agenda, in particular, our evaluation of services designed to increase and ensure access. Assessing whether the system, process, service or resource provides meaningful access to justice depends on the nature of the right, interest or legal problem at issue, the capacity of the individual, the complexity of the legal process or proceeding, and the seriousness and impact of potential outcomes.

These factors are supported by a growing body of jurisprudence and empirical research.

Developing a meaningful access to justice standard will involve a commitment to transcending the SRL phenomenon. SRLs appear to be an increasingly accepted fixture of our justice system, yet the current situation is unacceptable. A tripartite approach to reform is required, including:

105 See comments from SRLs and findings from Macfarlane and Birnbaum studies, supra note 6.
• reducing the need for representation through enhanced legal information and assistance services;
• where feasible, developing paths to justice (including forms of adjudication) that do not require representation; and
• re-engineering the delivery of private and public legal services to make representation available in a greater range of situations.106

Full legal representation is not required in every case: meaningful access can be assured through a range of legal services and forms of assistance, depending on the circumstances. A growing body of research can assist in translating this general standard into best practices to guide the delivery of legal services and decision making processes (both court and non-court-based). The key is to offer a seamless continuum of legal and non-legal services, and ensure that representation is available when needed to have meaningful access to justice. While a lawyer is not required in every case, people must have access to a lawyer when their situation requires it, regardless of their financial capacity.

A Dual Focus on Prevention and Resolution

Our long range goal is to shift justice system resources away from finding effective ways to deal with legal problems, conflicts and disputes, toward preventing them in the first place. At the Summit, many discussions circled back to the need to invest in building the fence at the top of the cliff,107 rather than spending all of our resources for the ambulance at the bottom. This does not mean abandoning those who require the ambulance, but it does mean finding ways to reduce the need for responsive interventions by increasing capacity for prevention and resilience. To use another analogy, we need to find ways to provide legal help “further upstream”. This analogy is used frequently in health prevention literature and derives from the parable of the fisher, tired of continually saving people being swept downstream, who decided to go upstream to find out why so many people were ending up in the water.

It is useful to think of this as a dual-track approach that provides a better balance of justice system services aimed at both preventing and resolving legal problems. A proposed statement of civil justice system objectives developed by the Australian Attorney-General’s Department distinguishes between a system in which “people can solve their problems before they become disputes” and “people can resolve disputes expeditiously and at the earliest opportunity.” Importantly, it recognizes the need for both approaches.

Reform must not be approached in a monolithic fashion or based on an idealized view of how people should approach their legal problems. Relying on concepts of “ideal” citizens, those sensible people who know their rights and responsibilities, resolve their disputes by discussion, act quickly and are always prepared, and know how to navigate the system, is not useful. While we shift the emphasis towards prevention, we must also keep in mind that there is no way to prevent all problems and disputes.

One System, Many Paths

Another central component of this proposed vision is building a more coherent civil justice system. There is rarely only one solution or resolution to a legal problem. There are many paths to justice, some leading toward and others away from formal court and tribunal processes. Those paths must be integrated to a much greater degree than at present and we need additional paths to meet everyone’s needs. The keys to greater coherence are effective navigation assistance and enhanced collaboration amongst stakeholders and participants.

Access to justice means more than simply access to the courts, but there are diverging views on what this insight means for the courts. For some, recognizing multiple paths to justice results in a ‘de-centering’ of courts, setting up an alternate system that is opposed to formal justice. However, in the Committee’s vision, access to the courts remains a central component within a broader access to justice system. It is the threat of coercion from the formal justice system that brings many defendants to the negotiating table, and the courts that ultimately decide what is just under the law. The Committee, like Hazel Genn, does not want to abandon “the language of justice”.\textsuperscript{108} It is not a question of de-centring courts, but re-centring them in an integrated, well-ordered justice system. Re-centred courts are required to ensure that the resolution of disputes is consistent with legal norms. Re-centred courts will also keep our laws and legal system alive through ongoing judicial interpretation.

Learning Institutions, Organizations and Systems

If we have learned anything from decades of access to justice reform, it is that these issues are complex and cannot be addressed through one-off initiatives. Equal, inclusive justice is a shared aspiration, one that can only be achieved through an ongoing commitment to learning, continuously developing evidence-based best practices and supporting innovation. Learning is required at many levels, ranging from adapting procedures based on public feedback and evaluation, to testing and refining mechanisms for the improved delivery of legal services to better meet the public’s needs, to integrating knowledge about common legal problems into systemic solutions.

Building a Bridge to Equal Justice

Reaching equal justice requires us to bridge the distance from the current state of inequality to the vision articulated above. The Committee imagines this ‘bridge’ as having three lanes, each representing different strategies for moving to equal justice. One lane is facilitating everyday justice, the second is transforming formal justice.

and the third is reinventing the delivery of legal services. Those three lanes are the topic of this part of the report.

The conceptual bridge rests on three structural supports: increased public participation and engagement; improved collaboration and effective leadership; and enhanced capacity for justice innovation. Those structural supports will be discussed in part III.

The Committee has proposed targets, milestones and actions for each lane and structural support. The targets are framed as measurable, concrete goals to be achieved at the latest by 2030. While different organizations and individuals may debate the specifics, the targets are designed to reflect a consensus of what is required. Achieving these targets will require individual, coordinated and collaborative efforts – none is in the purview of a sole justice system player.

Examples of immediate and interim actions and strategies are offered to illustrate the way forward, recognizing that much more detail is required and can be developed over time. Wherever possible, examples of emerging good practices and insights from research and evaluations, as well as links to further information are included in the discussion. The goal is to enlarge and change the conversation about access to justice in a manner that invites participation and inspires action. The Committee solicits feedback to these proposals and looks forward to an active and engaged dialogue.

Facilitating Everyday Justice

A new paradigm for access to justice is gradually evolving out of civil legal needs research that has taken place over the past several years. Currie has been a strong proponent of this shift, centred on the concept of “everyday justice”. The idea of everyday justice is that few problems, in reality, are dealt with in the formal justice system. Knowing this, we need to take a much broader view of access to justice. Facilitating everyday justice requires three main changes. We need to:

- Recognize that there are many paths to justice.
- Find ways to deal with a larger number of legal problems through a larger range of mechanisms.
- Shift our attention “far upstream from the courts” by investing in timely intervention and preventative services.

Facilitating everyday justice means improving legal capability, taking legal health seriously, enhancing triage and referral systems to navigate paths to justice and taking active steps to ensure that technology is well used to facilitate equal, inclusive justice.

Law as a Life Skill

Law should be seen as a life skill, with opportunities for all to develop and improve legal capabilities at various stages in their lives, ideally well before a legal problem arises. Law is a fact of life in the 21st century. Almost everyone will experience a legal problem at some point in their lives, but until that happens, most people don’t know what to expect from the justice system, the benefits of different paths and legal services and so on. Those involved in the justice system and in legal service delivery have a shared responsibility to increase the legal capabilities of everyone in Canada.

Building legal capability involves knowledge, skills and attitudes. Teaching law as a life skill also helps to cultivate trust and confidence in the justice system. All justice system participants can find ways to help build capability in their daily contact with members of the public.

Poor people and potential

“All people, including the poor, have enormous capacity to help themselves. Despite appearances, deep inside of every human being lies a precious treasure of initiative and creativity waiting to be discovered, to be unleashed, to change life for the better.”

Muhammad Yunus, Founder Grameen Bank, Lawyers Can Help Us to Win the War Against Poverty (2013)
Legal capability training is a new approach that builds on a rich foundation of public legal education and information (PLEI) resources and curriculum.

PLEI is key for people to develop their capacity to understand the law. Information is a basic element of access to justice. The focus of this section is on PLEI approaches to building law as a life skill, but PLEI is also an important aspect of the continuum of legal services, discussed later in the report, assisting people when they confront a specific legal problem or problems.

At present, most people seek out legal information when they are in a legal bind, during a time of crisis. The goal is to change this so that everyone develops basic legal capabilities as part of public education curriculum and has a continuing opportunity to build on this base of knowledge and understanding throughout their lives.

As Sarah McCoubrey, Executive Director of the Ontario Justice Education Network, explained in her Summit presentation, building legal capability involves three components: knowledge; skills and attitudes. Teaching law as a life skill helps to cultivate trust and confidence in the justice system.

Seeing law as a life skill is also consistent with what the Committee learned in the community consultations. Many individuals said they experience the justice system as withholding critical information. In their view, information about law and its processes empowers; it enables community members to know their rights and how to enforce them. Being informed helps to ensure equal participation in the justice system.

McCoubrey offered her framework for the elements of legal capabilities and highlighted the value of legal professionals sharing our advocacy skills.

Framework for Building Legal Capabilities

Knowledge
- Know where to find out more
- Understand the issues
- Know the routes to a solution (or processes)
- Know where to get help.

Skills of Legal Capability
- Listening
- Communication
  - Distinguishing between interests
- Imagining alternative solutions
- Ability to collect and record details
- Identifying between facts and emotions
- Empathizing with others in a dispute
- Identifying bias or self-interest

Attitudes of Legal Capability
- Trusting the professionals working in the system
- Believing that the system is impartial
- Believing that one deserves a fair resolution
- Having confidence that decision makers are unbiased (bribes, connections etc.)
- Believing that system evolves or can change
- Seeing that the system responds to injustices

Sharing our Advocacy Skills
- Consider All Perspectives
- Listen
- Find Evidence
- Talk to Experts
- Look for Bias
- Evaluate Sources
- Empathize with Others
- Be Curious
- Take Responsibility
- Give Reasons
The Summit workshop on PLEI centred on new challenges, emphasizing the need to empower the public and engage the legal profession to a greater extent. Legal practitioners need to do better at integrating public legal education and information resources into their delivery of legal services. Providing reliable legal information can help to build trust between a lawyer and client. Lawyers can also assist in developing PLEI materials, using plain language and providing specialized legal content to technology specialists, while also making their clients aware of and promoting easy access to those materials.

Some PLEI providers have expressed concern that lawyers may discount research that clients have done because they perceive it as threatening the lawyer’s role. It is difficult to gauge whether this concern is widespread or founded. Many lawyers, including John Paul Boyd, a leading proponent of integrating PLEI with delivery of legal services in the family law context, have suggested that an informed client is “not a threat, it is a blessing”.

PLEI providers agree there is room for more coordination and opportunities to learn from each other, as well as a need for more creativity, collaboration, neutrality and rigour. Open licensing can be used to encourage borrowing and reduce duplication. There is an ongoing debate about the best ways to aggregate information, whether by linking web resources through portals or by other means. PLEI should not be framed as a complete answer to the public need for legal education, advice and representation, but it is a valuable starting point to assist people to connect to other resources.

Target: By 2030, 5 million Canadians have received legal capability training.

Milestones:

- Law as a life skill courses are integrated into public education curricula
- Legal capabilities training modules are available to specific groups during life transitions (e.g. newcomers to Canada, older adults at retirement, young adults entering the workforce)
- Legal capabilities training is embedded into workplaces and other environments where training can be sustained
- Lawyers integrate legal capabilities approaches and work with public legal education and information providers (PLEI) in their delivery of legal services

Actions:

- The CBA and PLEI organizations work with the Council of Ministers of Education, departments of education, school boards and other interested organizations to advocate for the integration of law as a life skill courses into schools across Canada
- The CBA encourages lawyers to integrate PLEI materials and a legal capabilities approach in the delivery of legal services (where appropriate) and to assist PLEI organizations to develop and update materials
- PLEI organizations develop stronger partnerships with public and private sector organizations to integrate legal capabilities training into their existing programs, including those organizations serving members of the public experiencing life transitions (e.g. newcomers and seniors organizations)
- PLEI organizations develop, pilot and test national model legal capabilities training modules and protocols
- Justice system stakeholders work with PLEI organizations to develop and train rosters of law students, and current and retired lawyers and judges to deliver legal capabilities training in a variety of settings

Legal Health Checks

The access to justice literature has long recognized that preventing legal disputes is a key facet of an effective justice system. Prevention can be enhanced by better access to legal information and by public policy initiatives, such as no-fault insurance, proactive regulation or consumer protection, which remove the need for legal assistance to resolve problems by shifting the burden of demanding compliance to public bodies. Systemic advocacy to reform laws, regulations and institutions is often the only effective way to eliminate recurring problems because they can get at the root causes of repeated and often routine legal issues.
WHAT IS LEGAL HEALTH?

Everyone knows that by eating the right foods, having enough sleep and exercise and avoiding stress you can stay healthy, strong and be better able to ward off illness.

Just like your body, your “legal health“ needs attention. By following some simple steps your legal health can also be strong and you can avoid or minimize problems that could otherwise be expensive, time consuming and stressful.

There are certain events that most people face in life, such as entering or exiting a relationship, buying, selling or renting a house, the death of a loved one and possibly being questioned or arrested by the police. By being informed and by following some simple steps you can be prepared for these life events, even the unexpected ones.

Women’s Legal Services, Tasmania

Lawyers have traditionally played a pivotal role in preventing legal disputes, by providing strategic advice and planning services. This role is diminished now when many people have limited access to lawyers, so we must consider new means to make preventative measures more available. For example, providing post-dispute resolution support can assist in preventing legal issues from recurring or resolving related problems before they also develop into legal disputes. This approach is often referred to as building resilience to future legal problems.

Initiatives that focus on legal health advance our capacity to prevent legal problems and build resilience to future or recurring legal problems. Just as the health system aims to both prevent and treat disease, so too the justice system should aim to prevent legal problems in addition to providing assistance when they arise.

The legal health checklist model ties together the ideas of prevention, resilience and building legal capability. A number of legal practice websites encourage people to have an “annual legal health checkup” or offer checklists of situations in which legal needs or issues often arise. While to some extent these checklists are marketing tools, they could be a significant preventive measure if properly developed and employed. For example, Australian legal providers are developing legal health checklists that can be self-administered to create awareness of common legal problems and how to address them, or used by service providers to ascertain whether an individual who is seeking one form of assistance, say in a homeless shelter, has other types of problems that could be addressed through an appropriate referral. These checklists can also offer general advice on “how to stay legally healthy”.

Women’s Legal Services Tasmania has published an excellent booklet called Legal Health Checkup – What shape is your legal health in? It opens with an engaging introduction and definition of legal health. The booklet aims “to encourage people to take basic steps in their day-to-day life, which will help ward off legal nasties and other situations, which could otherwise be avoided.” It points out that both physical and legal health are important: “Taking basic steps like the ones outlined in this booklet and knowing your rights or where to go to get the right advice can be the difference between legal health and a legal disaster.”

According to the booklet, there are three essential items at the foundation of legal health: a will; a reliable post address; and a safe place for important documents. The booklet also provides checklists about legal issues that arise in ordinary day to day life, and in other more specific situations. These situations include: relationships (moving in together, getting married, having a baby, separation, divorce); putting a roof over your head (moving house, being a tenant, being a landlord, buying a house, selling a house); money money money (watching out for the credit crunch, mortgages, personal loans and other forms of finance, email offers and overseas lottery wins, rent to buy, financial abuse, bankruptcy); when someone dies

Legal service providers, including legal aid plans and community-based clinics, have a particularly key role to play in contributing to legal health, both at the individual and systemic levels. In addition to administering or making available personal legal health checklists, with appropriate resources these organizations could also carry out broader health checks — providing valuable feedback about the incidence of legal problems in a community and potential systemic solutions. These organizations could offer an early warning system about general increases in certain types of legal problems with a view to timely intervention and prevention. In some communities, this work would need to be carried out in conjunction with trusted intermediaries. However best established for a particular community, the idea would be to enhance opportunities for contact between members of the public and service providers, creating more everyday opportunities for ameliorating social exclusion and disadvantage and creating equality. At the Summit, Allan Seckel, CEO of the British Columbia Medical Association and former Deputy Attorney General for British Columbia, introduced the idea of “capitation” in the sense of assigning responsibility for the legal health of a community to a particular individual or organization. This idea takes the concept of legal health checks one step further. Both systemic legal health checks and the idea of assigning responsibility for the legal health of a community share the advantage of moving from an opt-in to an opt-out system. A valuable lesson from health care delivery is that services provided on an opt-out basis, such as vaccinations, have a much higher take up rate than those provided on an opt-in basis – particularly in reaching people living in marginalized conditions.¹¹⁰

We have a long way to go to integrate these insights, and develop measures of legal health and mechanisms to contribute more proactively to prevention. A commitment to rebalancing the emphasis on prevention and resolution requires us to broaden our thinking about how the justice system functions now. The concept of legal health encourages the kind of ‘outside the box’ thinking required to make this profound shift.

Target: By 2020, individual and systemic legal health checks are a routine feature of the justice system.

Milestones:
- Legal aid/assistance providers have a strong capacity to undertake follow up with clients on a routine basis, including, for example, through post-resolution follow up
- Legal aid/assistance providers have a strong capacity to carry out systemic health checks and routinely provide input to law and justice reform processes to enhance capacity to prevent/minimize frequent legal problems

Actions:
- The CBA partners with PLEI organizations to establish a universal Canadian legal health checklist and make it broadly available to individuals, to students as part of high school and other training curriculum, or by service providers to review with people using their services
- The CBA promotes the use of legal health checklists at Law Day and other forums and encourages other justice stakeholders to do the same
- Legal aid/assistance providers collaborate with each other and community groups to adapt the legal health checklist to their communities/specific contexts. The adapted checklist includes a tool kit with information on where to go for help and best practices guide for integrating checklists into service delivery
- The CBA collaborates with interested organizations to prepare an options paper on the broader concept of legal health and the prevention of legal disputes, including the use of legal health system checklists

Effective Triage and Referral to Navigate the Paths to Justice

There are many paths to justice and more are required to ensure that people are quickly and properly directed to services and assistance so they can effectively address their legal problems. The way people enter the system and the way they are treated on day one is the essence of a people-centred justice system.

People currently report finding it difficult to navigate the justice system. The need for improvement was highlighted in the Committee’s community consultations and on the street interviews:

“There should be a place that everyone should know about. If you have a legal issue, you can go explain your situation and they would tell you where to go, YWCA, website, etc. A sort of triage service to get you on the right track. Right now it’s all disjointed and hit or miss. It’s difficult to get good information.” Single mother, Moncton

“Have a central place with information and a “triage” service to point everyone in the right direction, e.g. both victims and offenders. If I was a person who needed a legal service, I would have trouble knowing where to start. Most people just have no idea.... what programs are new, who do I call?

Woman in Victoria, Envisioning Equal Justice on the street interviews

The hurdles people typically encounter in navigating current paths to justice and locating the services they need is underscored by mapping projects, such as the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice’s Alberta Legal Services Mapping Project and the American Bar Foundation’s Access Across America Civil Justice Infrastructure Mapping Project. So often programs and services have been developed ad hoc, adding an agency here and a program there as unmet legal needs become apparent or funding and other resources are identified. There has been no overarching vision or plan, and correspondingly, a lack of integration among various services. A step back is required to reorder what is available, as the current paths to justice are too complex, sometimes even for service providers themselves to effectively navigate.

Services must be designed to meet individuals’ needs at the particular stage they are at with their problems, rather than waiting for them to develop to the point that the formal justice system is involved. At the Summit, Mulherin noted that people do not always approach their legal problems or behave in the way that legal service providers expect or want them to. Australian research demonstrates though that people can learn about more effective pathways and “one of the indicators of what people will do with a problem this time is what they did last time.” Reform efforts must also account for changes that reduce accessibility by “breaking pathways”. For example, existing services may be de-funded, a service may be renamed, or a location or contact person may change.

Accessible services that help people resolve their issues without recourse to the formal justice system are critical. Often, providing specific appropriate services at the right time can avoid or ameliorate the problem without it getting worse and becoming a legal issue potentially implicating the formal justice system. Any triage system needs to recognize the role in preventing legal problems from developing initially, and intervening in a timely way to address those that do arise.

At present, points for people to access the civil justice system are highly decentralized. The advantage is that entry points tend to reflect the way people most often approach problems, for example through trusted intermediaries such as health care providers or social workers. The disadvantages are that it is uncertain where people will actually seek help, and their success relies too often relies on their degree of resilience and willingness to keep knocking on different doors, repeating their stories, until they finally resolve the matter. With each additional step, more people become discouraged and many give up, often at significant personal cost.

Even in the current model, the paths to justice can be made easier to navigate through standardized or generic entry forms that simplify transitions. Another option is providing ‘warm’ referrals, where the organization approached takes responsibility for ensuring that a referral leads to follow up and action, rather than leaving that with the individual. Equal justice does not depend on an individual’s resilience or ‘stick-to-it-ive-ness’ to effectively navigate the system and achieve a just outcome.

Perhaps the greatest single innovation required right now is an effective triage system in each jurisdiction. This is not a new idea. Community-based legal clinics or offices were initially designed to play this function, efficiently linking community resources and the justice system. Where clinics exist and resources permit, many continue this function. Significant steps have been made recently in some locations, including Family Law Information Centres in Alberta and Ontario, Justice Access Centres in British Columbia, and Centres de justice de proximité in Québec. Triage also takes place in some courthouses and many tribunals, but too often this is attributable to the skills and dedication of an individual staff person, like Louise, a well-known court case management coordinator in one Committee member’s community.

Still, we are far from having “integrated well-designed, transparent and intellectually defensible” triage and referral systems. The goal is to build an efficient and transparent sorting system to replace what Richard Zorza, a leading American access to justice scholar, of the Self-Represented Litigants Network, has described as “the multiple, inconsistent and non-transparent processes used by various separate programs and institutions”. He has argued that this is an essential feature of reform and that the current US system is the “complete antithesis” of what is needed. The situation is no better in Canada.

111 Ibid.
112 Zorza, supra note 102 at 866.
Zorza suggests that one reason for the lack of progress in access to justice has been a fear of “identifying individual cases in which services are required but cannot be provided for resource reasons.”

Tackling this concern would require building a system that could be modified to match service need and availability, while setting priorities based on principles (e.g. protecting those with lower capacity or those facing the highest stakes and most difficult issues). This makes sense, but the lack of existing services cannot be used as a rationale for inaction. In fact, one of the benefits of an effective triage system is that it would make the ‘mismatch’ or gaps between people’s needs and capacities and the services available to them much more visible. It would build learning into the system.

Awareness of this problem is growing, but there is no consensus about how best to address it. Three main approaches are currently part of the conversation:

• enhanced single points of entry such as justice access centres;
• building well-networked referral systems based on the ”no wrong number, no wrong door” philosophy; and
• putting services in the path of clients who are unlikely because of their geographic or social situation to come into contact with established entry points, including by working with trusted intermediaries.

More consideration should also be given to previous community-based options, including well-resourced community legal offices that serve as a clearinghouse for both legal and non-legal services, or an information and referral service to direct clients to the best sources of assistance for all aspects of their problems. Ontario’s community clinics provide a Canadian model.

Clinics provide services in areas of law that most affect low income individuals and disadvantaged communities, and particularly focus on issues around which a low-income “community of interests” can coalesce. Often clinics assist people with meeting their most basic needs, such as a source of income, a roof over their heads, human rights, rights to education and health care, etc... Clinics provide these services through a variety of methods, including traditional casework, summary advice, self help, public legal education, community development and law reform initiatives. Clinic work often involves trying to effect systemic change on behalf of the broader community.

These approaches should be seen as complementary, as long as they are a part of an effective overall triage and referral system.

See also findings summarized in Melina Buckley, Renewed CBA Legal Aid Policy (Ottawa: CBA, 2010) (unpublished 2009 background paper for Moving Forward on Legal Aid, on file at CBA National Office), including:

• cuts increased demand for advocate services, with several respondents indicating a doubling or tripling of their client caseload.
• opportunities for one-on-one client services substantially declined – a format many respondents identify as the most valuable type of assistance.
• impact is particularly strong for clients who experience other barriers to access such as language and literacy barriers.
• additional pressure on poverty law organizations, resulting in longer wait times for clients, increased stress for advocates, and a need to ‘triage’ clients to focus on crisis management rather than prevention.
• more clients simply giving up hope because there is nowhere to turn for assistance.
• lack of legal services is obliging women to return to, or remain within, unhealthy relationships.
• increase in the number of clients trying to represent themselves.
• outcomes for self-represented litigants tend not to be as good, and increase delays in the legal system when claimants lack adequate preparation.
• declining service quality and organizational support for providers.
• concerns about the place of appeals and judicial review, as legal representation is essential for these more complex and technical proceedings.
• limited availability of legal representation means that people’s rights are simply not being respected, and access to justice is accordingly compromised.
at three stages: the early resolution stage before a dispute crystallizes; on entry to the larger justice and advocacy system; and after entry into the formal system.\textsuperscript{115} Others have focused on a single court-based system, an option discussed later in the section on transforming formal justice.

In the Committee’s view, it is critical to move to a well-designed, sufficiently resourced and effective triage system, staffed by highly-trained and capable staff. Different approaches are likely needed to meet the needs of different communities within an overarching province- or territory-wide system. As with all major innovations proposed, it is critical that we evaluate and compare different triage and referral services to understand what works, and to integrate this knowledge on an ongoing basis.

Target: By 2020, each provincial and territorial government has established effective triage systems guiding people along the appropriate paths to justice.

Milestones:

- Triage and referral demonstration projects, including an evaluation component, are in place in each province and territory, building on existing initiatives and experience
- A national mechanism is in place to integrate evolving knowledge on the effectiveness of triage and referral services, policies and protocols, including the evaluation of demonstration projects
- A best practices guide is available presenting Canadian research and knowledge

Actions:

- Provincial and territorial governments work with PLEI organizations, legal aid providers and other service providers to prepare and maintain a comprehensive list of early resolution, legal and related services in each jurisdiction or region
- Provincial and territorial governments work with PLEI organizations, legal aid providers and other service providers to develop an agreed upon set of core principles to guide the design of triage and referral processes, including a common intake form. Some of this work could take place on a national basis or through the development and testing of prototypes in one jurisdiction to avoid duplication of effort.
- Provincial and territorial governments work with PLEI organizations, legal aid providers and other service providers, to develop and implement training in support of triage and referral policies and protocols

Inclusive Technology Solutions

Canada’s justice system lags behind other sectors for integrating technology. Technology (including information technology) can be harnessed to improve access to justice and is an integral part of all three major strategies for change discussed in this report: facilitating everyday justice; transforming formal justice; and reinventing the delivery of legal services.

Technology can:
- automate current processes and make them more efficient and accessible to individuals
- create new pathways to justice
- provide direct access to justice services (e.g. online dispute resolution).

While technology can support justice innovation generally, it is particularly useful for facilitating everyday justice. At the same time, careful planning is needed to prevent technological innovations from creating or reinforcing existing barriers to equal justice.

Trends in Harnessing Technology to Improve Access

Technology is increasingly used as a tool to both deliver information and expeditiously link people to the services that best contribute to equal access to justice. A recent Australian report on harnessing the benefits of technology in this context provides a helpful framework:

Today, the Canadian focus is primarily on applying existing technology initiatives, such as the internet and software applications, telephone and audio-visual technology, to improve access to justice. However, internationally, some sectors of the civil justice system are also applying emerging technologies, such as online dispute resolution, social media, cloud computing, smart phones, mobile software applications and mobile computing. In some jurisdictions, civil justice sector agencies and organizations are using websites for more than just providing information. There is increasing use of websites and Web 2.0 initiatives (such as blogs and social media) to both engage the public and gather information, for example, through polls, surveys and online consultations. Five main trends are identified in the Australian report:

• interactive web initiatives
• integrated legal assistance services
• online dispute resolution and telephone-based ADR services
• increased use of technology in courts and tribunals, and
• ‘one-stop shops’ for government services.

In this section, the Committee includes examples from Canada and abroad to demonstrate how technology is currently being harnessed to facilitate everyday justice. The use of technology by courts and tribunals is discussed in the next section.

Smartsettle is aimed at conflict resolution and dispute prevention for different decision making and negotiation situations, ranging from complex negotiations to simpler single issue disputes—eg family and small claims disputes. It is based in Vancouver, Canada but the software can be used for eNegotiations worldwide. It can provide parties with more control to decide, with a facilitator, on a combination of online and face-to-face meetings for their particular situation:

Consumer Protection BC has a self-help online tool for consumers to settle disputes with businesses. This is a relatively simple form of ODR that is delivered by email:

Remote mediation by teleconference is another obvious choice, but these services tend to be available in fewer areas, and often only for those who can afford to pay and are represented by legal counsel on both sides to coordinate it:
www.odr2013.org/
Technology can increase the channels of communications and access between legal assistance providers and community service providers to assist people living in marginalized conditions or in rural and remote areas far from most services. Properly employed, technology can improve access for Aboriginal persons, and for people with disabilities, from culturally or linguistically diverse backgrounds and in low socio-economic situations. A key consideration is to ensure that people receive the support they require at the first point of contact to avoid ‘referral fatigue’. Integrated web and telephone assistance services, telephone and audio-visual technology, social media and mobile software applications can all be recruited toward this end.

Best Practices – Example:

MIDLAS community legal centre in Western Australia has implemented a highly effective social media campaign to share relevant and up-to-date information and advocacy options with clients, while raising awareness about the plight of the disadvantaged, offering information and building stronger connections within networks. MIDLAS currently has six dedicated and integrated social media platforms:

www.midlas.org.au/media/socialmedia/

The Australian report concluded:

...while technology can offer great benefits in simplifying processes, reducing costs, improving communication and promoting access to justice as a whole, implementing technology solutions without a clear strategic purpose and policies underpinning their implementation may diminish the effectiveness of the solution. There is the risk of resources being wasted if the procurement and implementation of these initiatives is carried out without well thought out strategies.117

The report also noted that the civil justice sector’s slow progress in developing policies and strategies around the use of emerging technology has delayed the uptake of these initiatives. This delay can be partly explained by the interconnection between technology initiatives and technical and information management issues relating to confidentiality, privacy, identity security, record keeping and storage of information.118

US reports reach similar conclusions about trends in harnessing technology to facilitate access to justice. A growing number of technology tools are used by legal aid providers, courts tribunals and others, and new tools appear frequently. Adoption of the best tools is sporadic, and their use is far from widespread.119 Two US experts, Linda Rexer and Phil Malone, have identified barriers to adopting effective technology strategies for improving access to justice:

a) Lack of uniformity, standardization and simplification;

b) Perception that using technology is not full justice;

c) Resistance to change and planning for usability and quality;

d) Lack of top leadership support and impediments in large programs;

e) Lack of adequate and appropriately targeted funding;

f) Lack of guidelines for making technology decisions;

g) Lack of adequate policy framework and unauthorized practice of law; and

h) Fragmentation of the delivery system and lack of national support mechanisms.120

Many of these barriers overlap or interrelate. For example, being able to make good technology

117 Ibid.

118 Ibid.

120 Ibid.
decisions may be negatively affected, not only by a lack of guidelines but also by resistance to change, inadequate executive-level support for using technology or a fragmented delivery system with too few common systems to maximize resources.

Rexer and Malone propose ways to overcome these barriers:

- Incentives
- Money for evaluation
- Bring leaders together to provide them with info about IT
- Accurate info about costs of projects (upfront, support and maintenance)
- Cost savings can be achieved by consolidating hardware and software for multiple organizations into shared, virtual servers.
- Technology funding should be seen as iterative, rather than one-time, and funders should be mindful of the need for ongoing support and maintenance.

An intriguing way to foster innovation and engage public and private sectors is to sponsor “app development” competitions. This is an innovative and cost effective way to encourage new ideas, as the value of the apps created generally far exceeds the prize money offered to the winning entrants. There is significant scope for further growth in this area and public expectations for accessibility are likely to increase. For example, people will increasingly expect to access up to date information through mobile media devices.

The CBA Legal Futures Initiative is also taking a close look at how new technology platforms can impact the delivery of legal services. Its June 2013 report summarizing preliminary research, “The Future of Legal Services: Trends and Issues,” concludes that none of the critical change factors currently in play is more important than the rapid growth in innovation and adoption of new technology. It notes an uneven adoption of technology by law firms and lawyers; there have been few incentives and because of partnership structures and tax laws, very few firms re-invest profits in basic research and development, new processes, services and technology. Some key technology trends affecting the practice of law are online dispute resolution, an electronic marketplace (including virtual law firms), computer intelligence systems with capacity to manage and access data, solve problems, and draw conclusions and social networking.

Q Wonder about an app that would show wait times for different processes.
Or, one to empower people to provide feedback about the system and gather important information

Concerns about IT Solutions
Integrating technology solutions into justice system reform while ensuring that those solutions advance equal justice and inclusivity requires us to identify existing barriers and avoid creating new ones. Bonnie Hough, a US legal aid lawyer, has said about the adoption of new technology: “let’s not make it worse”. Hough is concerned about the “specter of a digital divide that institutionalizes a two-tiered system incapable of delivering appropriate justice to low-income persons.”124 She says: Technology offers many options for the largely underserved rural population. It can assist those who do have web access by providing legal information online and allowing litigants to access court files, pay fines and fees, and file documents remotely. Legal aid programs have also succeeded in using videoconferencing to reach rural residents. Videoconferencing and telephonic appearance procedures are also making it possible for rural residents to participate in some court proceedings without incurring the cost of traveling to the courthouse… However, [these developments are] not possible in all areas because of significant technological challenges. Indeed, many rural service providers do not have access to high-speed Internet connections, some lack cell phone reception, and others have little nearby access to fax machines. In addition, rural areas have high levels of illiteracy, which limits the value of text-based information. For these reasons, courts and legal aid providers must maintain traditional services even as they expand into new technological frontiers.125

She also points out that while technology can be particularly helpful in providing meaningful access to information and the courtroom for people with disabilities, other disabilities get in the way of accessing the internet and gateways commonly used to offer information and help. Thoughtful web design can overcome many challenges, but it cannot change the fact that fewer adults living with a disability use the Internet, compared to adults without a disability.126 Even ‘smart’ programs with built-in ratings/assessments/feedback features cannot reach or help people who for whatever reason will not use it to begin with, or try it once or twice but then give up.

For service or information providers, one of the greatest challenges to using technological solutions to increase access to justice is the lack of personal contact with an individual, contact that allows the provider to better gear what is offered to the needs of that particular individual. That personal contact can be the key for successfully navigating either informal or formal justice sectors, pursuing a process through to a satisfactory conclusion and achieving a just outcome. Integrating technology and access to justice must not replace personal assistance where it is needed to ensure equal justice.

Fostering Inclusive IT Innovation and Planning
The Committee proposes that by 2020, all justice sector organizations will have plans to harness technology to increase access to justice, ensuring inclusivity by eliminating barriers to underserved populations and avoiding new barriers. Developing and implementing these plans will be done in a way that ensures technology is integrated in a systematic, efficient and inclusive manner.

To accomplish this ambitious goal, Canada’s justice community could consider principles developed in other jurisdictions. The California Judicial Council commissioned an independent agency to survey California legal service providers and self-help centre staff to identify potential benefits and barriers from increased use of technology for low-income persons. The Council eventually adopted guiding principles that articulate fundamental core values for future use of technology in the courts, and offer guidance to courts and court partners on how to avoid barriers to access to justice.

The principles suggest considerations for court technology decision makers, rather than mandating

125 Ibid at 261-262.

126 Ibid.
any particular step.\textsuperscript{127} They recognize the need for those implementing court technology to not only ensure that innovations improve access to justice, but also that the innovations lead to appropriate and neutral substantive outcomes. They say that the first and most fundamental principle is to “Ensure Access and Fairness”, recognizing that the unique needs of certain groups of litigants must be at the forefront in technology planning.

Other main principles address real concerns about technologically assisted access by underserved populations, as several groups face particular challenges with using technologies:

- Preserve traditional access for those persons challenged by technology — encourage but do not mandate technological solutions
- Provide education and support to potential users of these services on an ongoing basis
- Secure private information including by informing individuals of risks associated with use of public computer terminals and ways to mitigate those risks.\textsuperscript{128}

Courts and legal aid providers should also consider hybrid legal service systems that integrate human and automated assistance. The question of inclusive design can be addressed in the early phases of planning and development, rather than left to the implementation stage. For example, software developers and web designers must recognize that features making an application ‘friendly’ for unsophisticated users may make it ‘unfriendly’ for those who use the application more frequently: “unsophisticated users are best served by an application that leads them step-by-step, whereas more frequent users are best served by an application that allows the fastest and most efficient data entry possible”.\textsuperscript{129} In some cases, two or more versions of an application may best meet the reasonable needs of both types of users.

A tremendous body of knowledge has developed around the strengths and weaknesses of particular technologies, strategies for choosing appropriate technologies, the challenges of effectively implementing and maintaining valuable technologies, and the effectiveness and return on investment of particular tools. To be most effective, courts and organizations deploying access to justice technologies need to be able to build on and leverage these experiences and best practices to design and implement their projects as state-of-the-art and integrated solutions, rather than reinventing the wheel and making avoidable mistakes. Beginning new projects from the strongest possible knowledge base prevents organizations from going down technology paths that end up conflicting with or excluding other valuable options and avoids wasteful mid-course corrections.

\textit{Linda Rexer and Phil Malone, “Overcoming Barriers to Adoption of Effective Technological Strategies for Improving Access to Justice”, note 119.}

Inclusive integration of technology should be supported on a national basis. Taking stock regularly will build a better understanding of how the current use of technology initiatives is doing to promote access to justice in the civil justice sector. Gaps, emerging trends and opportunities can be identified and inform a strategic approach for implementing technology initiatives that promote access to justice.

In the US, there are a number of national sources of information: National Technology Assistance Project, National Center for State Courts Information and Resources, Future Trends in State Courts reports, the Self-Represented Litigation Network and its \url{www.selfhelpsupport.org} collection.

\textsuperscript{129} \textit{Ibid.}
Several annual conferences present sessions on access to justice technology topics, including the LSC TIG conference, NCSC Court Technology Conferences and e-Courts conferences, and portions of the ABA Equal Justice Conference. Many states share specific examples of best practices and lessons learned with one another. The Kleps Award process in California’s courts involves a committee of judges and court staff who review and select innovations to improve court proceedings, with mechanisms for evaluation to assess effectiveness.

In Canada, the important national information sharing and evaluation role has been filled to some extent by the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice and the Canadian Centre for Court Technology, but more is needed. A comprehensive source for lessons learned, best practices and opportunities for more in-depth exchange about what works well could avoid repetitive research and duplicative efforts in developing new technology. Shared learning and joint evaluations would also promote technology that is holistic, strategic, efficient, and inclusive. A national strategy to ensure equal justice should include this critical component.

Target: By 2020, all justice sector organizations have plans to harness technology to increase access to justice, ensuring inclusivity by eliminating barriers to underserved populations and avoiding the creation of new barriers

Milestones:

- Evaluation and feedback mechanisms for internet-based and other technology-assisted solutions assess user experience as well as the reasons people do not use the technology or try to use it and give up
- Grants and other incentives foster the development of inclusive access to justice technologies

Actions:

- Technological innovations preserve traditional access for people challenged by technology, including access to a service provider, and the use of technological solutions is not mandatory
- Justice system stakeholders survey legal services and community services providers, court staff and others to identify potential benefits and barriers posed by increased use of technology for low-income persons
- Justice system service providers offer ongoing education and support to people using technology to accessing their services
- Justice system service providers provide active warnings to people about the need to secure private information and protect confidentiality; users receive messages about the limitations of the technology-based service and value of review by a legal service provider
- The National Action Committee, its successor, or another national organization:
  1) develops guiding principles for justice system stakeholders on how to avoid barriers to access to justice when using technology;
  2) provides centralized support for making good technology decisions, including by developing an evaluation tool for investments in new technology, and
  3) offers knowledge, experience and data about using technology to advance the planning and delivery of justice services for the most disadvantaged and vulnerable populations. The Federation of Law Societies, law societies or the CBA Ethics Committee, provides guidance on ethical and professional obligations when using technology to deliver legal services

Transforming Formal Justice

Courts around the world are engaged in a process of transformation. At the Summit, Zorza described this as a “thousand year change.” His point is that the last time courts changed this dramatically was when they became people’s courts. He describes a metamorphosis from courts as we have known them to “access to justice institutions”. There are two major dimensions to this process: external changes to the relationship of courts to other aspects of the civil justice system and internal changes to the functioning of the courts.

Many of these developments are a response to challenges and pressures on court systems, including changes in demands, limited resources and enhanced knowledge about the multifaceted nature of people’s legal problems. The goal of reform of the formal justice system is to complement informal everyday justice innovations, and eliminate gaps between formal and informal justice to create one seamless civil justice system. Here too, the central theme is forging more effective paths to justice and a greater variety of processes to ensure fair procedures and just outcomes, while at the same time building greater coherence. Hiil, an advisory and research institute for the justice sector, frames this as the need to focus on both specific justiciable problems as well as “justice supply chains.”

Transformation is a strong word, suggesting thorough, dramatic change. The Committee’s view is that it is the appropriate term for the challenges facing courts today, in Canada and elsewhere. Justice remains a cherished public good, and courts and an independent judiciary are essential to our public justice system and democracy itself. Court innovation need not threaten these bedrock constitutional principles. Indeed, transforming formal justice has the potential to ensure the continued vitality of courts by halting a growing disaffection on the part of the public attributable to costs and delay, and inspiring increased public confidence in judicial conflict resolution.

Global Trends and Strategies

Many court systems around the world are undergoing transformative processes but the purpose and direction of the changes are not always clear. Based on its international scan, Hiil sets out three possible scenarios for the future role of civil courts: courts as the forum of last resort; courts as the solver of legal issues; and courts as the central service responsible for adjudicating people’s problems. Hiil makes the following points about these three scenarios.

Courts as a last resort

• A place to go when all else fails.
• Legitimizing the view that people should avoid courts and solve their own problems instead.
• Courts should deal with only the most complicated cases.
• All routine issues dealt with elsewhere.
• Procedural issues, not the substance of the conflict, are more likely to dominate the litigation process.
• Maybe only role is checking whether other decision-makers did an acceptable job.
• Means courts cannot ensure application of the law to everyone.
• Courts may lose some of their legitimacy because they are further from contact with people.

Courts as solvers of legal issues

- Courts are there to provide answers to legal questions.
- The court “will not go into the conflict itself, but is the help desk for the legal problem or for qualification of facts under the law”.
- This model matches the tradition of legal education and refers users to other professions for other types of help.
- Mismatches between legal, psychological and technical expertise, perhaps leading to procedural issues and extended litigation. Risk of being too bureaucratic or legalistic: “A lawyer’s paradise, but not necessarily a paradise of justice.”

Courts as adjudicators of problems between people

- Courts are THE service that adjudicates problems: crimes and disputes as they are experienced by people in their personal lives, in business or in dealing with their government.
- Deal with large volumes of cases in a standardized way quickly.
- Problem solving courts will use many techniques to stimulate settlement and make decisions when settlement efforts fail.
- Great added value to society as they can be counted on to solve any serious issue in a fair way.
- Courts will need to adapt to new demands and some judges may find it difficult to adopt these new skills.
- Funding may be a serious issue and the system would depend on cooperative lawyers.

This framework provides a useful starting point to discuss the implications of court reform. The first two scenarios would result in a de-centring of courts in the civil justice system, and a corresponding decrease in their accessibility and role in people’s lives. The last scenario is favoured by the Committee, involving re-centring of the courts to be the main path to dispute resolution processes and referral to other services for non-legal aspects of people’s problems.

This re-centring of courts would involve transformation and overarching innovations. Global trends offer insight into which tools and approaches are most effective for court-based reform. These include a systems approach that integrates the wider context, using new information technology, distinguishing the minority of complicated cases from standard cases, distinguishing high and low value users, involving the private sector and empowering communities, users and staff. Some specific reforms have proven to be particularly effective, such as court specialization. Good results have also been obtained from making early hearings focused on providing advice about possible settlement options and early neutral evaluation the normal starting point. These early hearings would be followed by a second hearing a few weeks later.

Transcending the SRL Phenomenon

One of the greatest pressures on civil courts in Canada and the US today is the exponential growth of unrepresented or self-represented litigants. From one perspective, this is and should be the driving force of reform: courts should change to be more directly accessible to litigants without representation. While recognizing the immediate need to accommodate people without representation, the Committee questions this as a principled foundation for reform. There is mounting evidence that unrepresented litigants are at a high risk of not receiving meaningful access to justice. It is also unfair to all involved for judges and court staff to be responsible for finding solutions to a critical systemic problem resulting from failures of the justice system as a whole, notably including governments and the legal profession.

Certainly, short-term strategies must include accommodating unrepresented litigants and ensuring fair treatment (including by opposing counsel), as outlined in the Macfarlane study, but the ultimate goal should be to transcend the unrepresented litigant phenomenon by providing more seamless delivery of legal services to everyone, including representation when required. This perspective does not mean that there will be no unrepresented people by the Committee’s suggested target date of 2030, but it does mean that unrepresented litigants will no longer be considered a “problem”. Some people will self-represent, not because there is no viable alternative, but because they are able to do so competently given the nature of their problem or dispute, the process and their capacity to participate fully and effectively with available supports.

Court-based Triage and Referral

Effective triage and referral to appropriate services and processes is key to transcending the unrepresented litigant phenomenon and transforming courts to be fully centred in the broader civil justice system. Re-centred courts will develop capacity for triage and referral that complements and works in coordination with the jurisdiction-wide and community based networks that facilitate everyday justice, as proposed in the previous section.

Zorza has developed two models for court-based triage, one based on an individual decision-maker and the other on a computerized algorithm. The aims and general approach of the two models are fundamentally the same. Either model would unify the two sorting processes required; to determine how a court will handle a case and how litigants will obtain the services they need to interact with the court and other players. (This would include situations in which going to court would not be involved.)

Zorza and other US civil justice researchers, including Russell Engler, have written extensively about the importance of understanding the relationship between court processes and providing services for litigants. These are “moving targets” and the goal is to “figure out how the two processes can work together to provide both optimum case handling from the court’s point of view and access from the litigants’ point of view.” An embedded centralized triage system would take into account innovations on both fronts, again serving as a focal point for learning and integrating new insights.

Zorza’s models are well-developed and offer an excellent starting point for an initiative of this type in Canada. He recommends that the system be based not on categories of cases, but on the tasks required of the litigant and the court or other decision-maker. He identifies the following potential “court tracks”:

- Non litigation situations (which would jump to the next step, with the process possibly then managed by a services program rather than by the court)
- Uncontested cases requiring no court involvement beyond approval
- Uncontested cases requiring non-judicial court involvement to optimize agreement and decisions for fairness and finality
- Contested cases amenable to alternative dispute resolution
- Contested cases requiring single final resolution between parties
- Contested cases requiring extensive supervision of the pre-trial process
- Contested cases likely to require ongoing decision making and compliance activity

Breaking down litigant tasks and sub-tasks (such as preparing pleadings, presenting evidence, preparing analysis and judgments) so litigant capacity can be assessed is a complex task. However, a growing body of research in this area centred on the experience of unrepresented litigants to date can be harnessed to develop principled criteria.\textsuperscript{138}

Court Specialization

Specialized courts, both by problem type and target group, have been demonstrated to contribute to access to justice and quality of decision making. Indeed, the administrative law revolution was based on this premise. Despite the knowledge that specialized courts generally enhance efficiency, there is substantial resistance to this trend in the legal community. At the Summit, Muller spoke about the dichotomy between generalization and specialization, and the tension between the two. He emphasized that most innovation comes from specialization and so allowing for specialization is a positive goal.

Court specialization goes hand in hand with community-based justice models and integrated support systems able to assist people in a more holistic and collaborative way. Often these models and systems focus on criminal law matters and the intersection between people facing particular challenges, such as drug addiction or mental illness, and minor crime. In the civil context, specialization and holistic approaches have mainly been developed in the family law area and there is much scope for expansion on this front. Some specialized courts, including domestic violence courts, deal with overlapping criminal and civil matters. Others focus on a particular group of people, rather than an area of law. For example, there is a strong movement in Canada to approach issues faced by people with Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder as an access to justice issue and to develop specialized approaches to the multiple legal problems experienced by members of this vulnerable group (child welfare, family, criminal, guardianship and trustee), including fully integrated preventative measures.\textsuperscript{139} This approach acknowledges that access to justice involves systemic issues and is not simply about how individuals can handle legal problems.

Courts as Learning Organizations

Re-centred courts would have increased capacity and resources to engage in sustained innovation and more assertively become learning organizations. A learning organization is one that can continually transform itself by integrating evidence-based practices and facilitating individual and shared learning and systemic thinking. This model would assist in meeting the challenges of change by replacing structures and individual thinking, which tends to grow rigid and be best suited for short term or single loop learning, with an evolving understanding and problem-solving capacity. Learning organizations develop responsive cultures that maintain knowledge about new processes, understand the outside environment and produce creative solutions using the combined knowledge and skills in the organization. This requires cooperation between individuals and groups, strong communication and a culture of trust.

In the context of courts, learning involves soliciting feedback from the people accessing court services and effectively using that feedback to inform innovations and reforms. Learning also involves developing and testing prototypes for procedures and evaluating them to ensure that reform is evidence-based to the greatest extent possible. Much can be gained by sharing best practices between courts and tribunals and by coordinating reforms across different courts to minimize duplication of efforts. The Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice already facilitates an important dialogue between courts and administrative tribunals, but these opportunities for exchange should be increased.

Global developments and initiatives can also contribute to innovation in Canada. The International Centre for Court Excellence is developing a framework for court excellence that includes draft global measures for court performance to help courts improve their operations. The global measures consist of eleven “focused, clear, actionable, core court performance measures” consistent with “universally accepted judicial values and areas of court excellence”.

These measures deconstruct the key question, “How are we doing?” The measures are court user satisfaction, access fees, case clearance rate, on-time case processing, pre-trial custody, court file integrity, case backlog, trial date certainty, employee engagement, compliance with court orders, and cost per case. The measures and particularly public reporting on them contributes to both transparency and accountability. At the same time, while responsibility for performance is mainly assumed by the courts, it must be shared by all actors and organizations engaged in justice. It is ambitious but possible to imagine that by 2030, courts around the world, including Canadian courts, will report in a common framework of this type on their websites.

To achieve equal justice, judges, and particularly those in positions of judicial leadership, must advocate for reform within and beyond the court, and be concerned about the functioning of the civil justice system as a whole. Canada is fortunate to already have powerful role models in this regard. This critical role would be supported by the robust internal structure of the court as a learning organization. These issues are discussed more fully in Part III, including the US experience with access to justice commissions, where judicial leadership is often cited as the main prerequisite for success.

143 Ibid.
Expanding Judicial Functions

As members of the justice community, many of us share a traditional and limited conception of the role of judges, presiding over trials, hearing and evaluating evidence, finding facts, applying the appropriate legal standards, making judgments and dispensing justice. Particularly during the pre-trial phase of civil cases, judges have traditionally assumed a fairly passive role, allowing lawyers to control the progress and pace of the litigation. In the words of Lord Denning, he or she “must wear the mantle of a judge and not assume the robe of an advocate”. Judges must be free of bias and perceived as neutral and impartial at all times, and a more active role can suggest that the adjudicator has taken sides and prejudged the facts, evidence or credibility.

At the same time, judges have an overarching responsibility to ensure fairness of the proceedings and the efficiency and effectiveness of court procedures. At the Summit, Ottawa-based mediator and arbitrator Ian Mackenzie discussed contemporary challenges to the traditional role of judges, noting that it assumes:

- parties are well represented,
- truth will emerge from a contest of positions,
- parties will ensure that the public interest is reflected in evidence and arguments, and
- lawyers will be officers of the court (not relevant for unrepresented litigants).

According to Mackenzie, these traditional assumptions will be challenged by the “excessive adversarialism” that can result when parties are not represented. Unrepresented parties often lack knowledge about substantive law, procedures and rules, do not understand why processes need to be followed, lack objectivity or advocacy skills, and possibly have misplaced confidence in their abilities.

A more expansive view of the judicial function has developed in response to current challenges. This expansion is centred on more active case management, increased judicial dispute resolution and more active adjudication. Administrative tribunals have led the way in these developments, due in part to their greater institutional flexibility.

Many courts around the world have already embraced an expanded view of judicial roles and responsibilities in individual cases. In Canada, acceptance and comfort with this expansion varies widely in the judiciary and the bar, with enough discomfort to slow, and in many cases halt, reform. The Committee proposes that by 2025, these processes will have become mainstream in all courts and courts will be performing new functions in line with their re-centred status in the civil justice system. In some cases, effective implementation of novel functions will require courts to have a broader range of quasi-judicial officers with specialized functions, such as alternative dispute resolution.

Courts and judges must be provided with the knowledge and resources to make these changes effectively. There are also implications for the judicial appointment process, such as the need to allow consideration of candidates’ openness to and suitability for broader judicial functions.

Active Case Management

Case management was adopted by Canadian courts from the 1990s onward to address costs and delays in the justice system. Parties traditionally controlled the timing of case events within the overarching structure of court rules. Case management systems proscribe the timing of events to a greater degree. ‘Active’ case management means the judge takes responsibility for improving efficiency in the court, displacing the role of lawyers in this regard. This judicial function is essential both in the pre-hearing and hearing phases.

Summit participants cautioned that it is uncomfortable for many in the justice system to challenge or suggest changes to traditional approaches to the respective responsibilities of judges and lawyers. Some judges are more willing to take on the responsibility of preventing unnecessary delays. Also, active judicial case management can lead to other problems such as increased complaints of judicial bias and lawyers relying too heavily on case managers. Changes in this area must be fully supported by effective rule making and measures to promote cultural change through education. An iterative implementation process with enhanced opportunities for feedback and evaluation about how more active case management is in fact being implemented is necessary.

Judicial Dispute Resolution

The Committee proposes that by 2025, re-centred courts will offer more tailored dispute resolution processes, with a greater range of approaches to timely settlement. In some cases, this could mean referring parties outside of the court to more suitable processes, but it could also involve a greater capacity for judicial dispute resolution, particularly for the range of mediation processes.

Some Canadian courts and judges have embraced judicial dispute resolution, while others maintain the view that judges are appointed to decide. Similarly, the legal profession is not uniformly supportive of these developments. However, at least one provincial court has a new regulation for the judicial selection committee, allowing that committee to explore applicants’ capability and willingness to engage in new dispute resolution methods. The Ontario Bar Association is also engaged in a two-year study on judicial dispute resolution aimed at fostering similar developments. “The courts in Alberta administer a judicial dispute resolution program that provides litigants with an opportunity to schedule a confidential dispute resolution session with a Superior Court or Court of Appeal judge. Research undertaken in respect of the efficacy of this program suggests that approximately 90% of the cases subject to judicial dispute resolution… settle in whole or part.” 144 Still, there are remaining concerns about the availability of dates for this process, and the cost and complexity for the preparation of materials, which limits how accessible these options actually prove to be.

Active Adjudication

Judges engage in active adjudication by taking on a greater role in ensuring that the court has the evidence it requires to make a just decision. At its most basic, this approach suggests a judge simply looks at the decision required and determines what is needed to make that decision. This is a direct response to the growing number of unrepresented litigants and recognition that the adversarial process does not serve them well. Mackenzie describes active adjudication as “bending” the adversarial process to make it more amenable to unrepresented people without actually ‘breaking’ it and becoming an inquisitorial system. The major concern is that judges may ‘cross a line’ of involvement and appear to be biased – this is particularly valid when one party is represented and the other is not.

Zorza describes active adjudication as judges being engaged while remaining neutral. At the Summit, he described a research project that videotaped hearings with unrepresented litigants in courtrooms in four states. The videotapes were then shown to the litigants and judges separately, and each had the opportunity to explain what they were trying to say and what they saw happening. Litigants also offered their views on characteristics of ‘good judges’, as those who:

- are good at framing their cases – explain what happened in last court hearing, what is expected to be discussed that day, remind that all decisions are in best interests of the children (if family), explain that the judge will be asking questions
- are good at probing – trying to identify the issues and resolving them; questioning and framing the questions and reminding that the judge is asking questions because they need to get to the facts
- explain decisions very clearly
- use reassuring language – affirming without judging, saying things like, “I’m not judging you

144 National Action Committee, Court Simplification report, supra note 68 at 14. At footnote 33, the Working Group notes that, “[a] review of all of the provincial rules of court indicates that settlement conferences are generally in use across the country. For example, British Columbia’s Court of Appeal offers judicial settlement conferences (see British Columbia Court of Appeal Practice Directive, “Judicial Settlement Conferences”); the Queen’s Bench Rules in Saskatchewan contemplate judges assisting with settlement (see R.S.C. 1-3(1)-(4), 4-7(1)(e)); judges hearing a case management conference in the Northwest Territories can facilitate settlement and as a means of doing so, assist with settlement discussions or even hold a mini-trial in which he or she can provide a “non-binding advisory opinion” (see Rules of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories, R-010-96, pt. 19, r 292); a judge-assisted settlement conference process, which was recently expanded, has been in place in Quebec for a number of years now (see Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25); Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Labrador and New Brunswick also have judicial settlement conference regimes (see respectively Civil Procedure Rules of Nova Scotia, pt. 4, r 10.11-10.16; Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, S.N.L. 1986, c. 42, Sched. D, as amended at r 59; and Rules of Court, N.B. Reg. 1987-23, r 50.07-50.15).”
as people” or “I really appreciate you both love your children”
• discuss when the next court hearing will be or what will happen next
• have effective body language, for example “using hands to convey equality”
• use simple clear respectful caring words.¹⁴⁵

Mackenzie described a model of active adjudication currently employed for some cases by the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal (in others the hearing is run like a traditional trial). Tribunal rules say the:

Tribunal can define or narrow issues, limit evidence or submissions, require witness statements, and require narrative at beginning of the hearing. An adjudicator can conduct examination in chief and cross-examination, can prescribe stage at which preliminary procedural or interlocutory matters are dealt with, and require party to adduce evidence or call witnesses “reasonably within their control”.¹⁴⁶

Mackenzie describes his “active adjudication toolkit” as including the following skills:
• Defining or narrowing the issues to be decided
• Limiting evidence or submissions on any issue
• Requiring witness statements
• Permitting a party to give a narrative before questioning
• Determining the order of evidence and issues
• Conducting examination-in-chief and cross-examination
• Prescribing the stage at which preliminary, procedural or interlocutory matters will be dealt with
• Requiring a party to adduce evidence or call witnesses “reasonably within their control”.

Other assistance provided to unrepresented litigants by judges and adjudicators includes less active forms of intervention, such as directing litigants to resources available on the internet that may apply to their case, advising of other available resources including public mediation services, and at the trial management conference, offering litigants a summary of what will be expected of them at their forthcoming trial.

Supporting Court Innovation: Technology and Rules

The task of transforming formal justice should begin by considering broad strategies for reform, the implications of those strategies for the structures and processes used by courts, and the courts’ relationship to external service providers and the civil justice system as a whole. Closely connected are questions related to the judicial functions needed to meet these new roles and responsibilities, and how to support those functions by integrating technology to re-engineer processes and communication with users of court services and to support management functions. Court rules and administration can also play a key role in either supporting or deterring innovation.

The Australian report on enhancing access to justice through technology provides an overview of how courts and tribunals are increasingly using technology. Initiatives include a move to virtual courtrooms that allow documents to be filed electronically (e-filing) and, in some instances, for formal submissions, directions and other orders in pre-trial matters to be conducted by electronic means. There is also some progress toward integrated court management systems to give all courts and tribunals a single, integrated technology platform and set of applications, rather than having them work across different systems.¹⁴⁷

In Canada, similar initiatives are underway. British Columbia’s Court Services Online provides electronic searches of court files, online access to daily court lists and e-filing capacity. E-filing initiatives are in place in several courts, including the Alberta Court of Appeal, the Superior Court in Newfoundland and Labrador (in estate matters) and the Federal Court of Canada. An Alberta Court of Appeal practice direction supports e-appeals if both parties consent or the court orders them.\textsuperscript{148} Other initiatives include internal web-based tracking of court files, online access to court record information, electronic storage and retrieval of court documents, interactive court forms, e-hearings so proceedings can be held entirely electronically, and online information to assist self-represented litigants.\textsuperscript{149} Examples of online information include the Montréal Bar’s “best practices guide” to assist individuals with different aspects of litigation, Newfoundland and Labrador and the Public Legal Information Association’s booklets on a range of legal topics at the courts, Clicklaw in British Columbia, the Ontario Attorney General’s self-help guides about family court rules and procedures and LawHelp Ontario’s information booklets and how-to manuals for unrepresented litigants to assist in preparing court documents and participating in certain court processes. Québec has also recently implemented a Justice Access Plan with increased and new uses for technology to enhance access to justice, such as by obtaining testimony through videoconferencing.

A concrete example of the potential of technology highlighted at the Summit was in the area of family law. Segments of the Canadian population move around the country for employment. This results in multi-jurisdictional family law issues, which can be difficult to navigate without legal help. Use of information technology for court processes across jurisdictions could transform these issues. One participant noted that: “interjurisdictional child and spousal support orders take months, or sometimes years, to flow through the system in two jurisdictions. Making efficient technology available for the transmission of documents and attendance at hearings electronically could substantially impact how mobile families (and other litigants) access the justice system.”

Simplifying court processes and rules to support the transformation of formal justice is another important path to equal justice. As Muller highlighted at the Summit, rules should not lead the innovation process, as rulemaking is too rigid a process compared to problem-solving methods. Further, our rapidly changing environment and the need to tailor processes to particular types of disputes suggest that flexible guidelines may often be more useful than rules. Rules that are permissive, as those discussed above in the Ontario Human Right Tribunal context, may be most effective. Some Summit participants spoke about the ways that rule changes can have a mixed impact on access to justice. For example, they can contribute to judicial efficiency but also add costs for litigants (particularly those requiring documents submitted in writing before court appearances). Zorza has proposed guidelines for choosing measures for court simplification:

1. Work for all stakeholders
2. Help ensure focus on law rather than technicalities
3. Help ensure parties are fully heard by decision maker
4. Increase transparency
5. Underlying substance of law should be able to be applied in simplified process
6. Result in less time, less cost
7. Prevent reintroduction of complexity.\textsuperscript{150}

The focus on learning through feedback from users of court services and rigorous evaluation is essential for ensuring that changes are doing what they were intended to do. Evidence from other jurisdictions is mounting on what rule changes work best to enhance access to justice, with fixed trial dates within two years of commencement at the top of the list (unless the dispute is not ripe for settlement, e.g. a personal injury case when it is too early to assess damages).

Re-centring Courts

Re-centred courts will offer tailored public dispute resolution services with effective internal and external triage and referral processes, and will employ a wide range of quasi-judicial officers to assist litigants to achieve just and timely outcomes. Re-centred courts will be dedicated to innovation, learning and integration of evidence-based best practices. They will be open to feedback from users of court services and to developing transparent performance evaluation measures. As a result, judges will need to be ready to integrate new functions and approaches, potentially including active case management, judicial dispute resolution, specialization, court simplification and active adjudication models. Many Canadian courts have already taken steps in these directions and should be supported in these reform efforts. Reaffirming the role of courts at the centre of the civil justice system also involves building a new type of relationship between courts and other justice organizations. Issues for relationship building, structures for collaboration and leadership functions are discussed further in Part III.

Target: By 2025, courts are re-centred within the civil justice system and resourced to provide tailored public dispute resolution services with effective internal and external triage and referral processes.

Milestones:

- All courts have effective triage and referral systems
- All courts have the capacity to provide a range of dispute resolution processes and provide tailored, simplified processes
- Courts employ a wide range of quasi-judicial officers to assist litigants to achieve just and timely outcomes
- Courts have the resources to carry out this range of functions

Actions:

- Courts develop and employ a range of mechanisms to solicit feedback from people accessing court services and use these perspectives to inform innovations and reforms

- Courts develop and test prototypes of specialized procedures for priority categories of cases. Plotting different prototypes in each jurisdiction within an overarching strategy could maximize use of resources, avoid duplication of effort and enhance evidence-based reform
- The National Action Committee, its successor or another national organization develops an evidence-based best practices guide to assist courts in their access to justice innovations
- Judicial appointment processes take into consideration candidates’ openness to and suitability for broader judicial functions, including active case management and judicial dispute resolution methods
- The CBA champions this re-centred role for the courts within a coherent civil justice system: a central role not based on traditional, status quo role of the courts but on this people-centred vision

Re-inventing the Delivery of Legal Services

The third lane of the bridge to equal justice is reinventing the delivery of legal services. Both everyday justice and formal justice depend on having a spectrum and continuum of legal services available to meet the range of legal needs. The goal is seamless legal services delivery: to ensure meaningful access to justice in every case without the ‘legal assistance deserts’ in the current inequitable landscape of services.

The Committee believes that the first step is to define the concept of essential legal needs and then to find ways to meet those needs. Essential legal needs are those that arise from legal problems or situations that put into jeopardy a person’s or a person’s family’s security – including liberty, personal safety and security, health, employment, housing or ability to meet the basic necessities of life. A main objective of equal justice efforts must be to provide the necessary legal services to meet all essential legal needs.

The Committee’s Proposed Responsibility for Legal Needs connects the spectrum of legal service providers and the continuum of legal services with categories of essential legal needs. A range of approaches is needed to reach this goal, along with a commitment to finding new and creative ways to address existing gaps in legal services.

Some essential legal needs can be fully met by the private market, while others can only be adequately met through publicly funded legal services. Over the past two decades, the centre area of the spectrum between these two sources of legal services has grown in response to failures of both private and public providers to meet the most pressing and/or essential legal needs. Organized pro bono efforts and other specialized services, many based on public-private partnerships, have developed and expanded greatly during this period to fill gaps in legal service provision.

Reinventing legal services for equal justice involves meeting three challenges:

- ensuring the most effective delivery of both private and public legal services;
- achieving a consensus on where responsibility for meeting legal needs falls on this spectrum, from private to public service deliverers; and
- reaching a better understanding of the structure and role of service providers in the middle area between private and public services.
As shown in the diagram below, the Committee proposes that the main targets of reform should be to improve capacity at both ends of the publicly funded/private spectrum, to provide meaningful access to justice for people experiencing legal problems related to essential legal needs. Pro bono organizations and programs and public-private partnerships are best positioned to deliver legal services for important but non-essential and specialized needs that people cannot meet within the private market. This section also discusses the significant contribution of law schools and law societies to reaching equal justice.\(^{151}\)

\(^{151}\) The extent to which law firms and practitioners can innovate to better address the range of legal needs is also being examined by the CBA Legal Futures Initiative in the areas of business structures and innovation, legal education and training, and ethics and regulation of the profession.

Two competing pressures on legal representation services cut across the spectrum of service providers: the increasing unaffordability of legal services has given rise to a demand for piecemeal or partial services delivered by a broader range of providers, while the growing understanding that legal problems are often intertwined with non-legal problems has led to a demand for more holistic approaches that meld legal and non-legal services. Health care and dental care services are increasingly delivered in teams, for cost-effectiveness and quality of service, and legal services providers are at an early stage of incorporating this service delivery model.
Limited Scope Retainers

The greatest potential for achieving meaningful access to justice and fair and lasting outcomes comes from a comprehensive, holistic approach. Yet, a current trend to make legal services more affordable to clients or reduce cost to the providing organization is moving away from the holistic approach, and to limited scope retainers or unbundled legal services. This issue cuts across the service delivery spectrum, affecting lawyers in private practice, legal aid and those working pro bono, as well as those providing other forms of legal assistance, also increasingly in a limited, piecemeal fashion.

Limited scope services often rely on clients to sort out what services they need and when. Delivering these services also pressures lawyers to help clients find their way to other services.

Lawyers and legal regulators have been somewhat wary about this development. Professional obligations require a cautious approach to isolating elements of legal services for limited representation. This does not mean that it cannot be done, only that it must be done in a manner that ensures protection of individual clients and the overall public interest. Five law societies have provided detailed guidance to their members on how to meet their professional obligations when providing unbundled services.

Empirical research to date has found that limited scope services are of questionable benefit to many people participating in adversarial proceedings. An unbundled service is not the same as having legal representation. The Australia Law Reform Commission concluded that “unbundling can really only work for educated, articulate litigants in routine matters”.152 A US study found that SRLs have to carry out an average of 193 tasks to prepare for and participate in a formal hearing.153 Further, individuals need to “pull it all together” which many SRLs, including the majority of participants in the Macfarlane study, find very difficult.154 Other specific concerns are lawyers’ ability to offer sound advice without the full picture of their clients’ situation and how to ensure that an individual understands and is able to follow through on the instructions provided by the lawyer.

It is at least possible that the unbundled model, despite serving many more low-income people, might actually be making inefficient use of resources. To use a simplified analogy: If there exists a finite supply of AIDS drugs to distribute in sub-Saharan Africa, should it be divided equally among those who want it, even if this requires lowering the dose to an untested level that has not been proven to improve survival rates? Or should a full dose of medication, proven to boost survival, be provided to a smaller number of AIDS patients, with the remainder of the population required to wait for the next shipment of drugs? Unless and until it is proven that limited intervention on behalf of low-income clients is successful in producing better outcomes than litigants can attain on their own, a return to the traditional model of full representation for fewer clients--a proven model of success--should at least be considered, and resource and policy decisions should be made to facilitate increased access to full representation.

Jessica Steinberg (see note 62)

From an equal justice perspective, the question is whether limited scope services in a particular context are consistent with the meaningful access to justice standard?155 To answer this question we need to consider who may benefit from what types of limited legal services and in which situations. Meaningful access is advanced when these services are provided to capable litigants through an effective relationship between lawyer and client. For example, coaching, particularly during a hearing, can mean the difference between ineffective or effective assistance. However, limited scope services are not the solution for everyone.

The Committee proposes an overarching goal should be to ensure that limited scope services are only offered where the “meaningful access” standard is met. Overall this requires a range of private market and publicly funded solutions aimed at making representation more accessible. It also requires a new model of lawyering based on a reciprocal partnership between the provider of legal services and the client and where the service provider knows about alternate sources of information useful to their clients and collaborative networks with other service providers. This point underscores the importance of lawyers and other legal service providers collaborating with PLEI providers.

Target: By 2020, limited scope legal services are (only) offered in situations where they meet the meaningful access to justice standard.

Milestones:
- Best practice guidelines, based on empirical studies of emerging limited scope service models and their impact on meaningful access to justice are in place.

Actions:
- All law societies provide detailed guidelines to lawyers providing limited scope services, including advice and precedents for limited scope retainers
- Bar associations, law societies and legal aid organizations develop resources to assist lawyers to provide limited scope services in an integrated, seamless way by equipping lawyers to inform clients about other service providers and sources of information
- The CBA provides professional development on coaching and other skills that support the delivery of effective limited scope services
- The CBA, law societies, other bar associations and legal aid organizations work with PLEI organizations to inform the public about limited scope services
- The CBA and the Federation of Law Societies ensure the integration of existing research and evaluations of limited scope service models to formulate evidence-based best practices and identify further research needs

Team Delivery of Legal Services

Recognizing the value of a continuum of legal services approach means recognizing the importance of increased diversity and specialization among legal service providers and enhanced capacity to provide comprehensive, cost-efficient services through teams of lawyers, other legal service providers (like paralegals) and providers of related services (like social workers). Teams can deliver more comprehensive and holistic services tailored to people’s needs.

Advances have been made in the team delivery of legal services in both law centres and community-based and specialized courts. Inter-professional collaboration in one agency has many advantages: allowing clients to “one-stop-shop” and avoid referral fatigue, making legal services more time and cost effective by relieving legal staff from lengthy counseling sessions they may be ill equipped to handle and providing in-house education for legal staff through regular meetings and ad hoc consultations with other staff professionals. The presence of other professionals can also give legal staff a different and useful perspective about client circumstances.

While there has been some resistance to these developments in the legal profession, there is a growing consensus that it is a “win/win” situation, providing services to clients at a more affordable rate and lawyers with adequate income.

The Committee proposes that as a profession and legal community we increase the diversity and range of services available to clients through the integrated team delivery of legal and related services, so that by 2030 the vast majority, in the range of 80%, of personal law legal services are provided through a team approach. To smooth the way for team delivery of legal and related non-legal services, licensing, insurance and professional and ethical issues such as confidentiality and solicitor-client privilege, have to be resolved. Some Canadian law societies have examined alternative delivery of legal services, focusing on paralegals. Diversification in the legal profession also contributes to a team approach to service delivery. Other countries recognize a broader range of legal service providers with regulations and protections in place. For example, the UK has eight categories of legal practitioners and the State of Washington recently began providing limited licenses to legal technicians.

Target: By 2030, 80% of lawyers in people law practices work with an integrated team of service providers; in many cases these teams will operate in a shared practice that includes non-legal services and services provided by team members who are not lawyers.

Milestones:
- Evidence-based best practice guidelines for team delivery of legal and non-legal services in people law practices are available

Actions:
- The CBA prepares a discussion paper and models for team legal service delivery and coordination of legal and non-legal services for both private market and publically-funded legal services
- The CBA offers professional development materials and online discussion groups
- Law societies develop comprehensive regulatory frameworks for alternate delivery of legal services
- Law offices partner with other service providers facilitating team delivery of services

Reorienting The Practice of Law
This section looks at three proposals for changing the practice of law to enhance equal justice: establish sustainable people law practices; learning from the European experience about the potential of legal expense insurance; and enhanced regulatory approaches.

Sustainable People Law Practices
Our models for providing personal services law, or people law practices, have often not kept pace with the changing demands of our clients and pressures in the justice system. Changes are needed to:
- provide a greater range of legal services to respond to client needs
- provide a more predictable idea of costs to clients, and
- deliver services through a more engaged/participatory relationship between the client and lawyer.

Making people law practices more attractive to lawyers is also a key component of reinventing the delivery of legal services. Lack of affordability is perceived to be the main barrier to legal services but research in Canada, the US and the UK shows that deciding whether to hire a lawyer is influenced by a range of factors. These issues are canvassed in the Committee’s discussion paper on Underexplored Alternatives for the Middle Class.

Here the Committee highlights strategies to build and maintain sustainable people law practices through different organizational models from the current model of legal partnerships. In the US, the UK, and Australia in particular, there are already many examples. Law firms operate virtually and use alternative business practices to enhance flexibility and reduce overhead, for example, allowing them to reduce the cost of legal services to clients.

Alternative organizational models for providing legal services that focus on meeting the legal needs of people with low and moderate income are emerging and should be supported in a manner that contributes to reaching equal justice. This approach garnered much support in the Committee’s consultations and at the Summit. The Summit discussion was energized in particular by the work of Andrew Pilliar, a lawyer and doctoral candidate at the University of British Columbia Faculty of Law, who advocates for a reinvigorated sense of entrepreneurship for young lawyers keen to build viable social justice/access to justice practices and broader definitions of professional success. His master’s thesis investigates the experience of Pivot LLP, a law firm established as a social enterprise and funding source for the public interest work carried out by Pivot Legal Services. Pivot LLP also pursued associated goals, including providing affordable legal services.

Pilliar offers a “toolbox for legal entrepreneurs” based on his case study of the Pivot experience and related research. These tools set out 11 challenges for law firm models attempting to provide accessible legal services to a greater range of people: focus; recruiting; income stream; support staff; mentorship; keeping overhead low; using existing work forms; location; branding; decision making models and sources of business. The legal profession can help to build and expand these tools, and so assist in what they can offer in reaching equal justice.

In the UK and Australia, regulations have been modified to allow law firms to seek outside investment or operate under external ownership. As a result, alternative business models are becoming common. For example in England and Wales, co-ops now offer legal services and in Australia, Melbourne, Slater & Gordon became the world’s first publicly traded law firm. In the US, innovation has found its way into law firms in other ways. The alternative legal practice making the largest impact is Axiom, which describes itself as “a place where lawyers are passionate about practicing law, not billing hours”. Axiom has found innovative ways to offer quality legal services cheaper and more efficiently. As a result, it has grown exponentially to a 1000-person firm operating in 11 offices and four delivery centres across three continents. Other US examples include Gateway Legal Services and Chalmers Consulting, both building ‘self-supporting legal services programs’ through sliding scale fees, contingency fee awards and payments from third party beneficiaries.

In Canada, alternative models are starting to emerge as well. An innovative firm in Vancouver, Miller Titerle has developed around the principle of “helping people do good things”. The firm is structured as an open office space and operates “in the cloud” at all times. They reduce overhead by outsourcing legal research and other work to contract lawyers and paralegals who prefer to work from home. They offer flexible work arrangements for lawyers and support staff, and flexible fee structures for clients, including fixed fee arrangements. Recently, the firm has started offering a value guarantee, which allows clients to discount their bills by 25% if they believe the value guaranteed was not met. The firm is developing innovative programs to allow clients to access their corporate records and start new businesses online, including incorporation, corporate structuring, organization, and basic corporate/commercial transactions, at a low fixed cost.\textsuperscript{165}

Some other particularly innovative law firms in Canada include Cognition LLP, Conduit Law, Sky Law, Wise Law, AnticlPate Law, Heritage Law, and Valkyrie Law Group.\textsuperscript{166} These law firms are redesigning the legal service delivery model based on entirely new propositions about what clients identify as the value they receive from their lawyers, and eradicating paradigms like the billable hour while doing so.\textsuperscript{167}

Bar associations and law societies have an important role in fostering and supporting the development of alternative organizational models for viable and sustainable people law practices. Support from the legal profession as a whole is needed to facilitate the transition to these new models to ensure that by 2025, a wide range of alternative organization models for delivering legal services exists to meet the legal needs of low and moderate income Canadians, including those living outside major urban centres.

The legal profession can foster initiatives through ‘incubator programs’ that help recent law graduates transition into sustainable practice situations to serve individuals and small businesses, as well as through virtual practice arrangements.

In the US, ‘law school incubator’ programs successfully help graduates transition into sustainable practice. Incubators accelerate the development of start-up companies by providing entrepreneurs with instruction in financial management, marketing, networking and sound business practices. The idea started at City University of New York in 2007 and spread quickly throughout the US. In some cases, law firms and other service providers donate office space and money.

In some law schools this takes the form of ‘legal residency programs’ where recent graduates offer low-cost legal assistance while attending seminars on obtaining and billing clients, malpractice insurance and setting up a law office. Another approach is through ‘solo and small firm institutes’ or facilities, where recent graduates receive substantial training or have access to a facility for hands on training, including in some cases office space, office assistance, access to lawyer mentors and law practice guidance. All of this is geared to assisting young lawyers to launch their own practices. ‘Entrepreneurial lawyering’ classes help students develop business plans provided participants are committed to establishing a solo or small firm practice and helping underserved populations after completion of their incubator training. They are generally encouraged to provide pro bono and low-bono services to increase access to civil legal services for those in need.

New initiatives are especially significant outside urban centres, where barriers to accessing legal services are even more acute. Various legal organizations have worked collaboratively, particularly in Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia, to encourage the practice of law outside major centres. Virtual legal practices should be fostered including through expanded forums for learning, sharing and networking about these innovations.

Milestones:
- An evaluation of the effectiveness of sustainable people law practices at filling legal services gaps and providing meaningful access to justice is carried out, and the results are broadly shared to encourage learning, further innovation and best practices.
- All jurisdictions have legal practice incubator programs.

Actions:
- The CBA provides professional development materials, and hosts a PD webinar and online discussion groups to foster conversation and learning about alternative organizational models for providing people law services.
- The CBA develops a “startup package” for alternative organizational models for sustainable people law practices comprising for example, a handbook, contracts, other documents and training materials.
- A consortium of bar association, law society, law schools, law firms and business enterprises support the development of one or more accessible legal practice incubators in at least three jurisdictions.
- The CBA supports the establishment and maintenance of networking among these incubator programs to facilitate information exchange, development of best practices and continuous improvement.
- The CBA and law societies provide ongoing opportunities for mentoring and peer-to-peer sharing of best practices for sustainable people law practices, and consider how the recommendations of the CBA’s Legal Futures Initiative can be used to support lawyers in the creation of alternative service delivery models.
- The CBA coordinates a roster of experienced justice system participants, including law practice management consultants, to carry out awareness campaigns for law students, young lawyers and members of the profession (not just law firms) about alternative organizational models for delivering legal services.

Legal Expense Insurance
The holder of legal expense insurance (LEI) has a commitment from an insurer to pay some or all of the legal costs arising from certain legal situations. Insurers support legal services by both lawyers and paralegals and customers may include individuals, families and small to mid-size businesses.

LEI is popular in Europe and provides basic access to legal assistance for people who can afford to buy the insurance, often in conjunction with home insurance or tenant insurance policies. Approximately 40% of all Europeans have LEI, and in the UK 59% of families have some coverage under home insurance policies. In Sweden coverage has been mandatory since 1997 and its development ran parallel to decreases in the availability of legal aid.

LEI has not caught on in Canada to the same extent. In contrast to Europe, Canadians purchase only about $11-12 million of coverage per year. LEI has mainly taken hold in Québec, attributable in large part to efforts by the Barreau du Québec, which spent $2 million on a campaign to encourage Québécores to take advantage of LEI. Their ads are explicitly aimed at people who make too much for legal aid, but too little to comfortably afford counsel should a legal event occur. While the campaign saw the number of subscribers double, only about 10% of Québécores have coverage and only about 12 insurance companies provide the... product. In his 2008 report on legal aid in Ontario, Professor Michael Trebilcock concluded that the law society and Legal Aid Ontario should “accord a high priority to promoting the role of legal insurance.”

At the Summit, Barbara Haynes, the CEO of DAS Canada, summarized the current market for LEI in Canada outside Québec. DAS is a global leader of LEI operating in 18 countries including in Canada since 2010, marketing itself as providing affordable justice for the middle class. Haynes explained that LEI is not yet understood or accepted in Canada. Research is needed to understand why it is not currently purchased. This may be attributable to restrictions on the coverage provided by LEI. For example, family law matters are not included by most insurers at present. There is a perception that the premiums are high, but in fact the average annual stand alone premium for a family is $150-200 and a group purchase through a homeowner’s policy is about $50. Some concerns have also been raised about the ability to retain choice of legal counsel and to clarify who instructs the lawyer in a given matter, the insurer or the individual client.

The CBA has endorsed LEI that is adapted for the Canadian market by including family law services as one mechanism to increase access to justice. LEI is not a panacea, but the evidence from jurisdictions where it is commonly used shows that it could help many people get much of the legal help they need. The Committee proposes that by 2030 the vast majority of Canadians should have legal insurance as one part of a seamless provision of legal services. Reaching this goal requires working to overcome current limitations on understanding and availability of LEI.

The low uptake of LEI in Canada outside Québec appears largely because many people are unaware of its value. Unlike health, people often don’t expect to incur legal costs. They probably don’t know anybody who has LEI. If they thought about it, they might believe LEI to be expensive. People with limited discretionary income tend not to buy insurance and policy limits can mean that coverage does not extend to the types of cases that arise most often. Lawyers also seem to lack awareness of LEI or question its value, and this disinterest or distrust may be compounded by apprehensions that LEI will be bad for business. On the other hand, le Barreau du Québec was primarily responsible for the success in spreading LEI in Québec.

In August 2012, the CBA Council adopted a resolution directing the CBA:

- to collaborate with legal insurance providers to communicate to CBA members, government leaders and the public the potential for legal expense insurance to improve access to justice to the middle class in Canada and
- to ask insurance providers to adopt measures to safeguard and inform consumers, and adapt

---

168 He noted that the Law Society of Upper Canada had considered and endorsed LEI as far back as 1993, but that it had not yet made its way into the mainstream.
policies to address the legal needs of the Canadian market, requiring family law services to be included at reasonable cost.

Following this resolution, the Committee has attempted to start a discussion about these issues with the insurance industry. The Committee is committed to encouraging the expansion of LEI both in terms of uptake and the scope of coverage provided, particularly for family law matters. At the same time, a growing acceptance of LEI is also a matter of public policy and there is a role for government on these issues. This is discussed further below in relation to universal legal aid coverage.

Target: By 2030, 75% of middle income Canadians have legal insurance.

Milestones:
- Insurance providers offer a range of LEI policies that assist in advancing meaningful access to justice to middle income Canadians, including on family law matters
- Options for mandatory legal expense insurance are being fully considered

Actions:
- The CBA communicates that making LEI more available contributes to access to justice and is compatible with the profession’s interests
- The CBA develops a strategy, building on the Barreau du Québec initiative, to increase public awareness of the benefits and relatively low cost of LEI, through speeches, articles and testimonials
- The CBA continues to collaborate with insurance providers to encourage them to develop more LEI policies for Canadians, including for family law matters
- The CBA works with governments to explore the feasibility of mandatory legal insurance based on existing European models

Regulation and Access to Justice

The regulation of legal services has an impact on the availability and cost of legal services. This is a key point of intersection between CBA’s Equal Justice and Legal Futures initiatives.

These issues were canvassed at the Summit in a workshop developed by the Canadian Association for Legal Ethics. Speakers emphasized how regulation is increasing the price of offering legal services and reducing innovation in the legal service marketplace, exacerbating access to justice problems. Noel Semple, from the University of Toronto Faculty of Law, described three primary legal regulation tools:

- Barriers to entry: to offer legal services, a series of hurdles must first be overcome (undergrad, LSAT, law school, articles, licensing exam, etc.)
- Market conduct regulations: what must be done on an ongoing basis to offer legal services (pay dues to law society, attend professional development classes, etc.)
- Business structure regulations: that forbids certain business structures from offering legal services to the public.

The main purpose of professional regulation is to protect the public by ensuring the quality of legal services, but regulation can also limit access by restricting options for the delivery of legal services. Conversely, scaling back on regulation is likely to increase access but the trade-off may be less public protection.

During the Summit workshop, Professor Richard Devlin of the Schulich School of Law advocated for a more active role for law societies and provided his list of things that law societies must do to support access to justice:
• Enhance paralegal services (so far Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta have taken steps to do so)
• Permit alterative business structures ABS (described more below)
• Become brokers of legal services (there is a pilot project in Manitoba where law society matches clients with family law lawyers, and lawyers accept a reduced fee. However, the law society guarantees payment.)
• Make pro bono mandatory
• Make ethical infrastructures mandatory
• Promote financial transparency through the publication of lawyer remuneration.

Devlin also noted that countries like the UK and Australia have liberalized their legal services regulation, and asked the question: What price have they paid?

Professor David Wiseman of the University of Ottawa Faculty of Law provided an overview of the issues in the move to permit alternative business structures (ABS). ABS are businesses that provide legal services not owned or managed under the control or direction of lawyers. The main advantages of ABS are that they supply more capital and business expertise (organizational management, product development, branding, market research etc.) compared to current law firm structures. ABS may assist in addressing unmet legal needs by investing time and resources to reach out to more people who lack legal services. ABS may also increase access through marketing to clients that need services and may be more user friendly, accessible and inviting.

Hesitancy over ABS arises from a concern that allowing corporate legal practice will create ethical dilemmas and conflicts. Wiseman called this concern “overblown” given the existing tension lawyers face now, between their duty to the court and the client, and their need to also make a living. Regulators can address these issues directly. For example, in Australia, the profession outlined a hierarchy of obligations for ABS – court, client, and then owners. A serious concern is the potential to exploit vulnerable persons through marketing.

From the Committee’s perspective the central question is whether ABS will increase meaningful access to justice by those currently underserved by lawyers in private practice. Who will benefit from ABS? What ‘pain’ is addressed through this development? Wiseman stated that the supposed gains in equal justice are speculative at this point. There is an active and growing debate on ABS in Canada, and it is now under consideration by several law societies and the CBA Legal Futures Initiative, which acknowledges in its early research that ABS may migrate to Canada as markets become more closely connected. The initiative is examining ABSs from the perspective of increased access to legal services. Last year, ABA rejected a resolution permitting ABS in the US. More research and evaluation is needed on the access gains by ABS before it can be considered a priority for reaching equal justice.

Regenerating Public Legal Services

Public-funded legal services, generally referred to as legal aid programs, are an indispensable component of a fair, efficient, healthy and equal justice system. At present, Canada’s legal aid system is inadequate and underfunded, and there are vast disparities between provinces and territories on who is eligible for legal aid, what types of matters are covered and the extent of the legal services provided. Legal aid alone will not cure all barriers to access and it is important not to conflate legal aid with access. At the same time, our justice system cannot operate fairly and efficiently without a healthy legal aid system.

I found, first of all, that there is a huge consensus that the current system isn’t working, that the disparities and gaps in legal aid are truly deeply troubling, challenging to our core shared values, democracy, our shared citizenship, our understanding of justice and fairness. There’s a huge consensus that what we have isn’t good, that the disparities are unsupportable.

Alex Himelfarb
At the Summit, Karen Hudson, Executive Director of Nova Scotia Legal Aid, proposed the REACH framework for regenerating legal aid: Research, Eligibility, Advocacy, Coverage and Holistic services. These vital elements are woven into the discussion in this section.

Three main components are needed to regenerate legal aid:

- national legal aid benchmarks with a commitment to their progressive implementation, monitored through an open, transparent process;
- reasonable eligibility policies that give priority to people of low and modest means but provide graduated access to all residents of Canada who are unable to retain private counsel (including through contributory schemes); and
- effective legal service delivery approaches and mechanisms designed to meet community needs and the meaningful access to justice standard.

National Benchmarks

At its inception over 40 years ago, the federal government envisioned “the establishment of a coast-to-coast federally funded legal aid system that would cover both civil and criminal cases”, modeled on the Canadian medicare system. This vision was never met and Canada is further away from this goal in 2013 than when the program was created. National benchmarks for legal aid are completely non-existent and there is an unacceptable disparity in service provision between jurisdictions.

The Committee proposes the development of national benchmarks as the basis for a principled framework for this key social program, to counterbalance the sole focus on reducing expenditure as the key driver of legal aid reforms. National benchmarks should be focused and concrete, but leave scope for local priority setting and innovation. Benchmarks should be aspirational rather than setting a minimum threshold and include targets for progressive implementation.

National benchmarks should be established on the basis of evidence about legal needs and legal assistance required to ensure meaningful access to justice. This is a rapidly growing body of knowledge that provides a platform for developing generic and more refined standards. Where evidence is lacking, steps must be taken to fill the knowledge gaps.

The central feature of national benchmarks would be agreement on a definition of essential public legal services, based on a shared understanding of the legal issues or problems that involve fundamental interests. Responses to the Committee’s discussion paper on National Legal Aid Standards suggest that it would not be difficult to achieve a broad consensus. Essential public legal services include situations where basic human needs are at stake. These include: criminal law; child protection; family law; domestic violence; landlord tenant matters where an individual faces eviction; employment law where an individual is not represented by a union; refugee and immigration; and social benefit cases. Within this overall category of essential public legal services, cross-cutting issues would have to be addressed by national benchmarks, including the complexity and consequences of the issues; priority characteristics of individuals; the type of legal assistance from the continuum of available services required by the various factors at play; and assistance in addressing non-legal factors with a significant impact on the legal matter.

Several US initiatives have been established to empirically demonstrate where a right to publicly funded counsel is in fact essential. The Boston Bar Association’s Civil Gideon Project and the California legislature’s Access to Justice Statute, known as the Shriver Pilot, are models that could be considered as we work together to frame national legal aid benchmarks in Canada.

167 National Health and Welfare did indeed propose a combined criminal and civil program at that time, but the Department of Justice opposed it and the criminal cost sharing program emerged. Health and Welfare developed civil legal aid funding under the Canada Assistance Plan as a default. See Dieter Hoehne, Legal Aid in Canada (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989); Ab Currie, “Down the Wrong Road” (2006) 13:1 International Journal of the Legal Profession 99.

In addition to defining legal aid coverage based on essential public legal services, national benchmarks should also address eligibility and quality of legal aid services by employing services according to the continuum of legal services described above, in a manner consistent with the meaningful access to justice standard.171 Eligibility and delivery of legal services are discussed in the next two sections.

Rather than a minimum threshold, national benchmarks should be aspirational and include targets for progressive implementation. Benchmarks will supply a principled basis for legal aid funding decisions, be focused and concrete, while still leaving scope for local priority setting and innovation.

Target: By 2020, national benchmarks for legal aid coverage, eligibility and quality of legal services are in place with a commitment and plan for their progressive realization across Canada.

Milestones:
- Federal, provincial and territorial governments establish a national working group with representation from all stakeholders including recipients of legal aid, to develop national benchmarks

Actions:
- The CBA works with all interested justice sector, service providers and community-based organizations to increase public awareness about the importance of legal aid and the costly personal and social consequences of inadequate legal aid
- The CBA works with all interested justice sector, service providers and community-based organizations to develop a broad alliance of individuals and groups to support and champion the regeneration of legal aid and the development of national benchmarks
- The CBA and the Association of Legal Aid Plans, in consultation with other justice system stakeholders, prepare draft national benchmarks as a means of engaging stakeholders and fostering dialogue and action

Eligibility

The process described above for developing national legal aid benchmarks should also consider eligibility for publicly funded legal services. At present, some legal aid services such as public legal information are available to all, but most forms of legal assistance and representation from legal aid are available on the basis of a means test. Generally, an individual or family must receive social assistance or earn just above this threshold to qualify for legal aid. In many regions, people working full time for minimum wage do not qualify. In Alberta, even recipients of Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped are ineligible. The Barreau du Québec has implemented an advocacy campaign to raise eligibility to include those earning minimum wage. Québec has very recently announced a significant change to its eligibility standards so that more people will qualify for help172.

171 The continuum is discussed infra at 93 and the standard infra at 61.

At the Summit, Nye Thomas from Legal Aid Ontario (LAO) noted that LAO offers a range of legal aid programs and covers a range of essential legal issues, but has a lower eligibility threshold than all legal aid standards in Canada and the US. In a recent study, LAO analyzed its financial eligibility guidelines against Statistic Canada’s Low income Measure (LIM) – a commonly used measure of poverty. The LIM is an income threshold below which a family is likely to spend a larger share of household income on the necessities of food, shelter and clothing than the average family.

As discussed in Part 1, LAO has itself noted a growing gap between its financial eligibility criteria and the LIM in Ontario. Since 1996, all demographic groups have lost ground. Without corrective action, things will get worse, meaning more hardship, less access to justice, more court delays, more court ordered counsel, and more unrepresented litigants.

Thomas emphasized that expanding financial eligibility does not have a linear or automatic correlation to legal aid costs: “There are a lot of ways to improve accessibility which doesn’t mean you need to double costs. The money discussion is more nuanced than it is often portrayed.”

This highlights the critical relationship between coverage, eligibility and the type and extent of legal services provided by legal aid, and the strategic policy choices required to ensure meaningful access to justice.

There is a clear consensus that legal aid should be available to a wider range of people than at present. The stumbling block is not that this is a bad idea, but that it is impractical and unaffordable. A more difficult question is, if eligibility should be extended, how far should it go: To everyone living below the LIM? To those earning a minimum wage? To people of modest means? To all Canadians?

At the Summit, the Committee invited Alex Himelfarb, former Clerk of the Privy Council, and Sharon Matthews, a lawyer at Camp Fiorante Himelfarb, former Clerk of the Privy Council, to debate the question: should there be a national justice care program in Canada? This was an opportunity to explore whether legal aid should be a universal or targeted social program, a question raised frequently during the Summit.

Both speakers based their positions on an understanding that a national justice care system, similar to the universal healthcare system, is a noble idea and reflects good public policy. Himelfarb argued in favour of adopting a vision of a national justice care system and building it in increments. Research has demonstrated that “if you target your social program to those in need, sooner or later that program gets starved”174, because the political commitment wavers when many people aren’t benefiting from it. People need to see what their tax dollars are buying for them. The current dismal state of legal aid targeted only at the neediest of the needy reinforces his position. The more people have a stake in the quality of the system, the better it will be. Targeted social programs also tend to be ineffective in that they can unjustifiably exclude

In short, the legal aid system, despite the important normative rationales that underpin it, is not a system in which most middle class citizens of Ontario feel they have a material stake. As a percentage of the population, fewer and fewer citizens qualify for legal aid, and many working poor and lower middle-income citizens of Ontario confront a system which they cannot access and which they are expected to support through their tax dollars even though they themselves face major financial problems in accessing the justice system (as witnessed most dramatically in the family law area, but also in various areas of civil litigation).

This leads me to suggest that both LAO and the Government of Ontario, through the Ministry of the Attorney General, need to accord a high priority to rendering the legal aid system more salient to middle-class citizens of Ontario (where, after all, most of the taxable capacity of the province resides).

people who require services. Professor Michael Trebilcock of the University of Toronto Faculty of Law has made this same argument.\textsuperscript{175}

For purposes of this debate, Matthews, a long time advocate for legal aid, argued that while a national justice care system should be the ultimate goal, Canadians are not ready for it. The CBA-BC Branch, as part of its legal aid advocacy campaign, highlighted how little most people know about legal aid and so, do not really understand its importance. Given the low public traction of legal aid, Matthews argued that it is better to focus limited resources on improving legal aid for those most in need, rather than providing justice care for people who can afford to pay. In her words, “without a foundation of public support we can’t make real changes and we don’t have the foundation of popular support.” She suggested that it is best to meet the needs of the most vulnerable and build from that base in an incremental and affordable way.

Following the ‘ambitious but possible’ theme used to set its targets, the Committee proposes that eligibility for legal aid be increased gradually over time, so that by 2020 all Canadians living at and below poverty level are eligible for full legal aid coverage for essential legal services and by 2025 those services are available to low-income Canadians, defined as those with incomes less than two times poverty levels.

The Committee also proposes that we fully canvass, develop and encourage an informed public dialogue about options for a national justice care system.

Funding options include client contribution schemes (based on ability to pay) and public insurance schemes (whether mandatory or opt-out). Eligibility can be approached flexibly: it does not have to be uniform for different types of services.

Professors Sujit Choudry and Michael Trebilcock and James Wilson have developed a proposal for a non-profit legal expense insurance scheme for Ontario that would operate through the province’s legal aid plan. The proposal would address shortfalls in access to justice, while remaining grounded in the public interest, in contrast to for-profit private market legal expense insurance plans discussed in an earlier section. Under their proposal, everyone would be assumed to subscribe to the insurance scheme, with allowance for people to opt out.\textsuperscript{176}

Another option is offered by popular reforms enacted in Finland in 2002, which raised the proportion of households eligible for assistance with their legal costs to 75%, with cost sharing on a sliding scale. (The figure is below 30% in most English-speaking common-law countries.)\textsuperscript{177}

Coverage encompasses criminal and civil matters, ranging from simple estate inventories to complex litigation. The main criteria are the seriousness of the matter and how well the applicant can handle it alone, rather than the area of law.

Targets:

By 2030, options for a viable national justice care system have been fully developed and considered.

By 2025, all Canadians whose income is two times or less than the poverty line (Statistics Canada’s Low Income Measure) are eligible for full coverage of essential public legal services.

By 2020, all Canadians living at and below the poverty line (Statistics Canada’s Low Income Measure) are eligible for full coverage of essential public legal services.

Milestones:

- The working group on national benchmarks (see Milestone for ‘Regenerating Publicly funded Legal Services’) develops a proposal for a gradual expansion of eligibility for legal aid
- A vigorous public policy dialogue about the value and feasibility of a national justice care system is underway

Legal Aid Services Delivery

Today legal aid plans offer an array of legal services that vary widely from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. In some places, services include the full continuum from legal information to representation, while in others legal aid provides a narrower range of services, such as duty counsel and representation. In addition to direct service, the continuum of services can include strategic advocacy and test case litigation on issues affecting low income people, so that problems can be addressed on a systemic basis instead of dealing repeatedly with individual cases. Strategic advocacy contributes to efficiency in courts and tribunals and the proper functioning of our legal system. Services are provided by a mix of employees, often operating through legal centres or clinics and by lawyers in private practice working for rates generally far below market rates.

Legal aid plans in Canada have spent many years making do with less, and have become adept at doing so. Although many provincial and territorial governments have increased legal aid funding in the past 5 to 10 years, demand continues to far exceed the capacity of most legal aid plans. This approach is unsustainable. Changes to legal aid services should be driven by the legal needs of the communities served, not by a drive to decrease expenditures in every way possible.

There is a gap between the information available to legal aid providers and the perspectives of the broader community as to how well current services address the public’s legal needs. While legal aid program evaluations including client satisfaction components are generally strong, the Committee’s community consultations and other recent public forums have provided less positive feedback. Complaints are heard about the inadequacy of and lack in flexibility in legal aid, but also the quality of service offered (for example, delays in getting service, service providers not caring, not doing thorough work, not fighting hard enough for clients, or not listening to or respecting clients). Many felt the underlying cause of these problems is that legal aid lawyers are overworked and underpaid. Related to this observation, many of those consulted believed that people with low incomes are given second-class service relative to private legal services.

“Unless you have lots of money, you cannot access justice.” Single mother, Moncton

“Once you finally get there and you get an order, there is nobody there to enforce it. This is what I needed. Now that I have an Order, it’s not being respected and there is no one to do anything.” Single mother, Moncton

“To me, legal rights are an unfulfilled promise.” Person with Disability, Toronto.

“If you don’t know what your rights are, how can you have them protected?” Single mother, Kentville

“Their (legal aid lawyers) case load is so big that they cannot go through every detail of the case. It’s hard when you are trying to prove your innocence and they are not willing to fight for you.” Aboriginal person, Saskatoon
“Legal aid lawyers burn out, so justice isn’t served. They need to open it up more; the lawyers lose passion when they are overworked and underpaid, which is unfair to lower class society.” Aboriginal person, Saskatoon

The Committee also surveyed legal aid lawyers, paralegals and community legal workers across Canada and received over 700 responses. Respondents expressed a widespread belief that legal aid services are not meeting the ever-increasing demand for services and basic needs of the community:

“Many clients are left with the prospect of no legal assistance with their divorce or spousal support claims and with their criminal charge, and so on.”

“Why do we even talk about “clients” if they aren’t getting services? And these are in the two chief areas where legal aid actually does provide service, family and criminal. Confused.”

“Current Legal Aid Services are inadequate to meet the needs of today’s clients and communities, let alone those of the future.”

“Even though Legal Aid is supposed to fund family and criminal law matters, very limited matters in each are actually covered.”

“Those not able to get spousal or child support or a fair divorce settlement can end up in poverty.”

Quite a few lawyers expressed a lack of trust between legal aid management and providers of legal aid:

“Proper planning for the future must recognize increasing demand for services but also that services must respond to wider community needs and a more comprehensive view of the costs of inadequate legal aid.”

None of this should be taken as a critique of legal aid plans or of the lawyers doing legal aid work: both are doing their best in difficult circumstances. In some cases, positive innovations have resulted from efforts of plans to keep within budgetary targets. Many Canadian legal aid plans have developed and implemented innovative and cost-effective service delivery models, working closely with communities, pro bono organizations, and other justice service providers.

Overall, legal aid innovation is characterized by a greater mix of legal services designed to reduce the divide between full legal representation and no representation, in a situation of scarce resources. The predominant trend is to provide information and limited assistance, putting the onus on the litigant (or accused) to “self-help” with various levels of support.

At the Summit, Nova Scotia Legal Aid Executive Director Karen Hudson listed examples of recent innovations by legal aid plans in the child welfare area:

- in British Columbia, Aboriginal community legal workers are targeted specifically for child welfare matters
- in Ontario and Newfoundland and Labrador, enhanced duty counsel determines legal aid eligibility prior to or at the first appearance, and provides post docket negotiation, social worker assistance, representation at pre-trial conferences and even at hearings
- in Newfoundland and Labrador, legal aid teams are comprised of lawyers, paralegals and social workers
- Nova Scotia offers specialized professional development
- Ontario has partnered with law schools to develop a clinical course in child welfare
- the Territories are using ADR approaches to get the parties together with counsel early on (even before a protection application is brought), coupled with ongoing and timely disclosure

In 2012, LAO announced a new mental health strategy to provide criminal lawyers whose clients have mental health needs with funding to support their clients’ specialized needs: www.legalaid.ab.ca/AnnualReport2013/Strategy/Pages/FamilySettlementServices.aspx

Multi disciplinary approach in Alberta (family resource facilitators) and Nova Scotia (family support assistants).
Another important trend is to become more inclusive by incorporating services that meet the unique needs of particular disadvantaged communities. For example, legal aid plans are using court support workers familiar to local communities to respond to clients with mental health needs. LAO recently launched a mental health strategy that includes improved access to advocacy, enhanced training, increased capacity of service providers, and developing a research agenda. The strategy also provides criminal lawyers whose clients have mental health needs with funding to support those special needs.

Alberta has launched a Cultural Liaison Specialist project, to provide language and other services to newcomers to Canada.

British Columbia’s Legal Services Society has launched an Aboriginal section on its website178, with information about different available options specifically intended to address the needs of Aboriginal people, including Gladue reports, Gladue courts, aboriginal community legal workers, aboriginal child protection, mediation and circuit courts, and expanded duty counsel.

As noted earlier in this report, the community legal clinic movement, which has operated both separate from and in some cases in conjunction with legal aid, involved a more holistic approach at its inception. Evidence is clear that holistic services are what people want and what is best able to supply the lasting outcomes. Our central objective must be to move away from piecemeal self-serve models and toward comprehensive holistic approaches which value the client as an engaged participant. When we think of justice access centres or multi-disciplinary, multi-function centres, and outreach, we should be thinking about them in the context of legal aid.

National benchmarks should set out criteria determining the type, quantity and quality of services. To the greatest extent possible, criteria should be based on evidence-based practices. Criteria should take into account whether the individual can take some initial steps, perhaps with some advice, and whether or when the individual would require in person service. Where appropriate because of the complexity of the case, or the challenges facing the individual, full representation should be provided. The standards should assist in identifying the point at which the individual requires on-going assistance, including from the outset. Assistance with mediation or other settlement processes should be included, when appropriate for the case.

National benchmarks should encourage innovative and collaborative legal aid services. Consideration should be given to mandating specific legal services, like duty counsel, to provide summary advice at an early stage in proceedings and to facilitate dispute resolution.

What can be done to support legal aid innovation to improve meaningful and inclusive access to justice?

1. Enhance outcome-based evaluation of programs and monitoring of developments and sharing of knowledge gained
2. Dedicate resources to establish and maintain mechanisms to share best practices between legal aid plans
3. Increase opportunities for legal aid providers to come together to share and learn – perhaps through an annual or biennial conference.
4. Online learning opportunities – webinars.

The Association of Legal Aid Plans (ALAP) plays an important role in fostering innovation but is not resourced to fully meet this need. Many legal aid lawyers participated in the Summit and voiced a strong need for a regular forum.

Target: By 2025, all legal aid programs provide meaningful access to justice for essential legal needs through inclusive and holistic services that respond to individual and community needs and integrate evidence-based best practices.

Milestones:

- Legal aid providers develop an increased capacity for outcome-based evaluation and research, as well as monitoring and sharing information about developments to facilitate Evidence-based best practices

- Prototypes of innovative holistic legal aid service delivery models have been developed and tested. Results are integrated into practice and broadly shared to encourage learning, further innovation and best practices.

Actions:

- Legal aid providers build and strengthen relationships with other social service organizations to develop more holistic service delivery
- The Association of Legal Aid Plans is resourced to play a national leadership role in support of strong, innovative legal aid service delivery including through research, monitoring and sharing developments
- The Association of Legal Aid Plans develops measures of inclusivity to integrate into evaluation frameworks
- The Association of Legal Aid Plans completes its work on a common framework for data collection for all legal aid providers

Bridging the Public-Private Divide

As innovations in private service delivery and an increased commitment to publicly funded legal services build up the ends of the spectrum of meeting legal needs, gaps in service that remain can be addressed through public-private collaborations. Pro bono efforts have been an important aspect of these collaborations, and the profession has demonstrated its commitment to offering those services as an aspect of professional responsibility. At the same time, there is a growing need to clarify the relationship between legal aid and pro bono, to ensure that they work well together into the future. According to Access Pro Bono Executive Director, Jamie Maclaren, "we view it as high time that legal aid and pro bono be genuinely treated as mutually supportive systems." 179

In addition, law schools are enhancing practical opportunities for law students, through clinical education, experiential learning and more, not only better equipping students with applied skills once they graduate but also developing awareness of social justice and the public’s unmet legal needs and instilling a pro bono ‘culture’ in young lawyers.

The Place for Pro Bono

The combination of private market and public legal services currently available in Canada cannot meet the demand for access. One of the main mechanisms to bridge the divide between public and private legal services is organized pro bono services. The Committee defines pro bono work as providing legal services without fee to people or organizations that can’t otherwise afford them and which have a direct connection to filling unmet legal needs.

There has traditionally been some debate in the profession about the extent to which expanding pro bono services is likely to undercut public commitment to legal aid. The Committee’s consultations revealed a strong division in views about the profession’s responsibility to provide pro bono and the extent to which a tension between pro bono and legal aid exists. 180 Some individuals and organizations objected to the suggestion that there is a tension at all, but most of the feedback supported the idea that while there does not need to be tension, it does indeed exist. Further, it is exacerbated by the serious underfunding of public legal services and competition for those scarce funds. Law firms may prefer to focus on pro bono contributions rather than taking on legal aid files or advocating for better legal aid services. At the same time, there is a remarkable degree of effective collaboration between legal aid and pro bono services, and this collaboration should be encouraged and supported.

Perhaps more fundamentally, there is a strong division in views on whether it is acceptable that the volunteer efforts of lawyers be considered a formal part of the justice system. This also raises questions about the sustainability of a system increasingly dependent on volunteer efforts. At one end of the debate are those that believe pro bono contributions, either in cash or kind, should be mandatory. At the other end are those who believe an increased emphasis on pro bono is problematic, in that it accepts that a fundamental aspect of citizenship and democracy is not an entitlement to justice but that access to justice may depend on the charitable impulses of others. Concerns are also expressed about how organized pro bono, no matter how well-motivated, simply reproduces power imbalances and injustice experienced by vulnerable clients, and unfairly distributes responsibility for filling the void created by an underfunded justice system to the least powerful or most ‘socially committed’ members of the profession.

The predominant view is a pragmatic one: lawyers do pro bono because they see a great, unmet need and they are able to help. Lawyers who normally practice outside the personal legal services field may enjoy volunteering as a complement to their regular, business-oriented practices. In addition, some see the profession’s pro bono contributions as a kind of bargaining chip to deflect criticism when it calls for increased legal aid funding.

Others emphasize the importance of pro bono in maintaining a legal profession committed to public service. Indeed, the CBA has long promoted the legal profession’s engagement in pro bono services. Twenty years ago, the CBA Wilson Task Force on Gender Equality in the Legal Profession recommended that students be required to engage in some pro bono work before they are granted their law degrees to “send a very clear message to students about the importance of such work and ... help connect students to the community” and “reverse the trend toward commercialization of the practice of law and restore the professionalism and virtues of public service.” In 1997, the CBA Systems of Civil Justice Task Force recommended that the CBA develop a program to “monitor, promote and publicize pro bono work carried out by lawyers and notaries.” Emphasis was placed on the value of law firms setting targets and creating incentives for lawyers to provide pro bono services and for the profession as a whole to recognize the importance of these efforts.

In creating these pro bono organizations, the well-off in the profession, whether judges with generous salaries and pensions, tenured law professors, or secure practitioners who have the wherewithal to serve as governors of the profession, are essentially organizing and deploying the labour of the legal proletariat: students, those struggling to become established in practice, and so on. These volunteers join the ranks of the low-paid legal aid lawyers, and the practitioners who eke out a living serving the disadvantaged, in delivering needed services.

Access Pro Bono, Pro Bono Law Alberta and Pro Bono Law Ontario are working with the federal Department of Justice on pilot projects in the respective provinces to engage public sector lawyers in providing pro bono services.
Pro bono organizations in several provinces and the national Pro Bono Students Canada have made great strides in increasing access to justice. Biennial conferences have contributed to information sharing and development of best practices among pro bono lawyers. Pro bono organizations are an important part of the justice system in the communities and provinces where they exist. Pro bono organizations have developed innovative programs to better serve client needs. For example:

- as of May 2013, Access Pro Bono in British Columbia is actively seeking lawyers to staff 2 hour clinics once or twice a month, by speaking to pre-screened clients by phone or Skype for half hour interviews. This allows the client to be matched to a lawyer experienced in the required area of law, and lawyers to contribute pro bono help from their offices. It also addresses the lack of legal help available in many rural and remote locations.

- In 2009, Pro Bono Law Alberta announced a partnership with a law firm and an Edmonton Health Centre’s Housing program, with the goal of ending homelessness.

- Pro Bono Law Ontario has established a medical/legal partnership providing legal services to families of critically or chronically ill children being treated at Sick Kids in Toronto or the Children’s Hospital in London.

Pro bono programs can also assist young lawyers in their professional development through specialized training and mentorship, and opportunities to enhance practice skills through experience.

Despite these advances, pro bono services vary greatly from one jurisdiction to another, and even within provinces and territories. An international scan shows that pro bono developments also vary dramatically from one country to another. In the US, pro bono services are fully accepted as the main mechanism to promote access to justice.181

However, in Australia pro bono plays a limited role in meeting peoples’ legal needs. A recent survey revealed that over 60% of the pro bono work undertaken there by large law firms is for organisations rather than individuals.182

The Committee’s long term vision of equal justice is one in which all essential legal needs are met by public and private legal service providers (supported by legal expense insurance as appropriate). A justice system permanently based on volunteer efforts is too ad hoc and unsustainable to provide effective and durable access. Regardless of how extensive the legal profession’s efforts, pro bono cannot possibly fill the current gap created by public-private legal service providers. According to Maclaren, “although we have the highest level of pro bono engagement in the country, we simply cannot meet the overwhelming demand for legal representation in this province.”183

The late Alan Parker, QC, a recognized pro bono leader in British Columbia, said it this way:

Wherever I have been associated with new service delivery initiatives, the latent demand surfaces. This is true every time Access Pro Bono opens a new clinic around the province. A recent example was our yearly Advice-a-Thon public clinics that we hold in open area-settings in Vancouver, Victoria and Kelowna. When we put up legal advice tents in Victory Square one day last month, we were, literally, swamped by walk-in clients. In short, if you build it, they come in.184

Where does this leave pro bono and public-private partnerships? As these service providers are neither designed nor equipped to provide a predictable and secure response to essential legal needs, their energies are more appropriately streamed toward important but non-essential legal needs, such as resolving disputes that have a significant impact on the individuals involved but may not put their security or ability to meet basic needs at risk. Consumer protection issues could fall within this category, for example. Test case and public interest litigation are essential aspects of publicly funded legal services. In addition to the litigation carried out or funded by legal aid plans and other public interest advocacy clinics, this is also a good area for pro bono contributions and a great opportunity for partnerships between legal aid and pro bono.

Lawyers acting pro bono and pro bono organizations should continue to work in collaboration with legal aid organizations to provide seamless delivery, but with greater clarity on the line between their responsibilities. Pro bono programs are nimble, flexible and can marshal resources quickly, and so are also arguably well suited to emergent and emergency situations as a stop-gap measure.

Lawyers should continue to consider pro bono as a professional obligation and pro bono organizations should continue to play an important role in encouraging and facilitating these volunteer efforts. The focus should be on encouraging pro bono contributions by lawyers who do not regularly provide people law services, such as lawyers in large law firms, corporate counsel and government lawyers. Until the targets proposed by this report are met, it can be expected that the level of unmet legal needs in Canada will continue to be a serious concern, one that pro bono efforts by the profession contributes in significant ways to alleviate. It is important to view the many targets in this Report as a whole, in terms of how they fit together. The Committee is not suggesting that there will be no place for pro bono in its vision of equal justice – but rather a refocused place that better dovetails with what legal aid and the private market provide.

This transition in pro bono priorities and participation should be tracked through a survey of the legal profession. In Australia, the National Pro Bono Resource Centre conducts an annual survey of national law firms that could serve as a model.

Targets:
- By 2025, the justice system does not rely on volunteer legal services to meet people’s essential legal needs.
- By 2020, all lawyers volunteer legal services at some point in their career.

Milestones:
- Pro bono programs work with legal aid and other service providers to phase out dependence on volunteer legal services to meet people’s essential legal needs and reprioritize their work to meet other gaps in the availability of legal assistance.

Actions:
- All law societies and legal employers remove barriers to participation in pro bono programs.
- The CBA Pro Bono Committee collaborates with pro bono organizations to develop and carry out a national survey of pro bono contributions in Canada.

Law Schools, Legal Education and Law Students

Law schools support both private and public delivery of legal services and have a direct role in providing legal services through legal clinics. An important avenue for advancing access to justice is by engaging the legal academy to a greater extent than at present. One promising development is that the Council of Canadian Law Deans has established an access to justice committee to review the role of law schools in this area.

Students need opportunities to learn about, reflect on, and practice the all encompassing responsibilities of legal professionals. The other professions employ well-elaborated case studies of professional work while law schools, which pioneered the use of case teaching, only occasionally do so. Lack of attention to practice and the weakness of concern with professional responsibility are the unintended consequences on a single, heavily academic pedagogy to provide the crucial initiation into legal education.

Doug Ferguson, 2010, speaking about Educating Lawyers: Preparation for the Practice of Law (Sanford: Carnegie Foundation, 2007)

Overview of Law School Involvement

The Big Picture

In preparation for their review, the Council of Canadian Law Deans prepared a summary of current law school access to justice initiatives. Many schools have initiatives to encourage and support students from communities that are under-represented within the legal profession.

The Federation of Law Societies’ list of ‘competency’ requirements has not include an access to justice component, or a requirement for experiential legal education. Some law schools have attempted to address access to justice by weaving relevant issues into mandatory basic courses, optional seminars and clinic courses.

Examples from Law School Courses

The University of Windsor Law School offers a mandatory full year course in access to justice for first year law students. The signature aspect of this course is collaborative projects for justice (P4J). Students must research a real life barrier to justice, prepare a background paper, and propose a solution. Some creative innovations have been proposed, including a public awareness campaign, a business plan, a software application, a policy paper, a public service announcement, a series of brochures and a guided interview ‘app’ for a particular legal document.

Osgoode Hall Law School requires its graduates to take part in an experiential legal education course, and provide 40 hours of community service.

Student Legal Clinics

All but three of Canada’s law schools operate some form of legal clinic. Western University clinic director Doug Ferguson has categorized these legal clinics into five types: representational; informational; placement; advocacy and simulations. Representational clinics are the most common and fill a gap in providing legal services. Hundreds of law students assist thousands of low income persons who don’t qualify for legal aid and have no place to turn. Representational clinics are in every Canadian law school except those in Québec (where students are not allowed to appear in court) and New Brunswick.

All clinics provide some form of experiential learning for law students and assist individuals and non-governmental organizations in various ways. However, some argue that despite some progress, Canadian law schools are still not doing enough to integrate practice and ethics into legal studies. The Association for Canadian Clinical Legal Education (ACCLE) is a group of individuals and clinics who came together to improve experiential education and to facilitate connection and collaboration between clinics across Canada. More recently a parallel student organization (ACCLES) with similar objectives was established.

Pro Bono Students Canada
Pro Bono Students Canada has chapters in 21 law schools, providing additional practical training and opportunities to increase access to justice. Executive Director Nikki Gershain, reports that 90% of volunteers plan to offer pro bono services once they graduate from law school, and 55% said their participation in pro bono had an impact on that decision. No longitudinal studies have been carried out to demonstrate this impact.

US Developments
Some US law schools require students to take experiential learning courses as a graduation requirement. For example, Washington and Lee University has transformed their third year into experiential learning. As noted earlier, many law schools sponsor ‘incubator programs’ to assist recent graduates in developing accessible legal practices. Some law schools have similar programs that involve law students, such as the Justice Bridge program at Northeastern University.

Alternative clinical legal education programs, such as Street Law in Washington, DC engages students to work with community members to develop self-help tools and capabilities, as well as systemic and preventive solutions to recurring justice issues.

The Family Law Education Reform Report from the Association of Family and Conciliation Court Services, William Mitchell College of Law and Hofstra University Faculty of Law emphasizes the need for students to learn about their place as a lawyer in the range of service providers. This approach could be generalized to other subject areas that particularly impact low and moderate income people.

The ABA Recodification of Accreditation Standards requires that: “A law school shall offer substantial opportunities for student participation in pro bono activities.” Schools are also encouraged to address “the obligations of faculty to the public, including participation in pro bono activities.”

Access to Justice Research
Research on access to justice is not a priority in all Canadian law faculties. Civil justice research often lags behind research on criminal justice issues, where departments such as criminology and sociology have made great strides. There are reasons to be optimistic that civil justice research is on the rise, including through collaborative research alliances. This issue is discussed further in Part III.

Future Directions
The Summit included a rich discussion on the role of law schools, law students and legal education in fostering greater access to justice. Some ideas discussed include:

- Law students can do more to address unmet need if given the opportunity and support by law schools.
- Law schools have a critical role in shaping professional identity to highlight public service as a component of ethical lawyering.
- Rewarding research on access to justice.
- Law societies and law regulators should consider changing the monolithic entry structure for the legal profession (the UK or England and Wales) has 8 different legal licensed occupations).
- Criteria for promotion, tenure, and renewal could be adjusted to give appropriate weight to experiential learning in courses, service to the profession, service to the community, and encouraging pro bono activities.

Professor Bruce Elman advocates for law schools to take a leadership role in modeling the lawyer of the future by formulating an aspirational statement for every law student. That statement includes a community service component and integrates this approach in all aspects of law school life. Elman has developed detailed proposals to this end and sees this as making a substantial contribution to equal justice.

Law students are a vigorous force for change and many law faculties are also keen to increase experiential learning opportunities and make stronger contributions to access to justice. At the same time, education and training goals do not always coincide with access goals. Students can make an important contribution, but cannot be expected to address the vast range of unmet needs.

At the Summit, there were discussions about how law schools could become more engaged in contributing to equal access to justice. The CBA, law societies, and members of the legal profession have an important role to play in advocating for and supporting these changes. The new Law Practice Program in Ontario will also support more experiential learning to enhance access to justice.

To the extent they are not already doing so, law schools should take a dual focus to integrating access to justice into education, by establishing requirements for all students and supporting opportunities for those particularly interested in access to justice. All graduating law students must have a basic understanding of issues relating to access to justice and know that fostering access to justice is an integral part of their professional responsibility (i.e. think systemically, act locally). Steps could be taken to encourage students who want to contribute more in this area, such as special internships, supporting innovations and research paper prizes.
Targets: By 2030, three Canadian law schools will establish centres of excellence for access to justice research.

By 2030 substantial experiential learning experience is a requirement for all law students.

By 2020, all graduating law students:
- have a basic understanding of the issues relating to access to justice in Canada
- know that fostering access to justice is an integral part of their professional responsibility.
- have taken at least one course or volunteer activity that involves experiential learning providing access to justice.

By 2020, all law schools in Canada have at least one student legal clinic that provides representation to low income persons.

Milestones:
- Law school curricula examined and adjusted as needed to meet the targets

Actions:
- The Council of Canadian Law Deans supports development of access to justice curricula
- Each law school appoints a staff member to serve as champion/leader for engaging discussion between the school and justice system stakeholders, including the public, about the role of law schools in supporting equal access to justice
- Law students have opportunities to become involved in CBA access to justice initiatives, including discussions of this report

making the equal justice vision real

Making the equal justice vision real

This report is an invitation to act, or as one person attending the Summit put it, to “just(ice) do it”. A fundamental step to reaching equal justice is laying the foundation for ambitious but possible targets for an equal, inclusive justice system by 2030. At the same time, the Committee recognizes the barriers to even modest improvements to access to justice, let alone the type of change the Committee advocates.\textsuperscript{189}

The Equal Justice initiative was designed to consider four systemic barriers that have hindered substantive progress on access to justice reform and to propose means to overcome them. The barriers are:

- Lack of public profile of access to justice
- Inadequate strategy and coordination between those seeking improvements
- No effective mechanisms for measuring change
- Gaps in our knowledge about what works and how to achieve substantive change.

In this part, the Committee examines these barriers more closely to consider how best to overcome them, so we can move from the current situation of unequal justice to the vision of equal justice. Here the focus shifts to the three structural supports in our conceptual bridge to equal justice:

- increased public engagement, participation and ownership of the justice system;
- improved collaboration with effective leadership; and
- enhanced capacity for justice innovation.

Two perspectives frame this discussion. First, access to justice is a ‘wicked problem’, meaning it is a complex policy problem that defies quick fixes and simple solutions. A second and related point is that given the scale of change required, we need to go beyond conventional approaches. One could say a ‘superhero’ is required, but certainly, effective leadership is fundamental.

Access to Justice is a ‘Wicked Problem’

Decision making theory refers to very complex problems as ‘wicked’ problems, not in the sense that they are actually ‘evil’, but because they are highly resistant to resolution. In its 2007 report, Tackling Wicked Problems: A Public Policy Perspective, the Australian Public Service Commission outlines characteristics of these problems:

- They are difficult to clearly define: the nature and extent of the problem depends on who is asked as different stakeholders have different views of what the problem is.
- They are often interdependent or co-exist with other problems and there are multiple causal factors.
- They go beyond the capacity of any one organization to understand and respond to.
- There is often disagreement about the causes of the problems and the best way to tackle them.
- Usually, part of the solution to wicked problems involves changing the behaviour of groups of people or all members of society.\textsuperscript{189}

All these characteristics apply to the access to justice problem in Canada today. Further, like many \textsuperscript{189} As in Part 2, when the Committee refers to “courts” in the general or conceptual sense in this Part, it views this term as potentially encompassing court-like tribunals that adjudicate disputes for individuals.

wicked problems, attempts to solve the access to justice problem have generally been unsuccessful or have met with partial but disappointing levels of success, and even to unforeseen negative consequences. These chronic policy failures give access to justice problems an appearance of being intractable and diminish support for change. It is easy to see equal, inclusive justice as simply too hard a goal to achieve and to give up or set our sights on minimal reform objectives. Rather than depressing action, however understanding the nature of the challenge can empower us to bolder solutions.

Tackling wicked problems requires a bold approach founded on a shared recognition and understanding that there are no quick fixes and simple solutions. The Australian Public Service Commission report discusses key ingredients in solving or at least managing wicked problems:

- Holistic rather than partial or linear thinking – need to grasp the big picture including the interrelationships between the range of causal factors and policy objectives;
- Innovative and flexible approaches;
- Successfully working across both internal and external organizational boundaries;
- Engaging citizens and stakeholders in policy making and implementation;
- A principle-based rather than a rule-based approach;
- Iterative processes involving continuous learning, adaptation and improvement; and
- Developing innovative, comprehensive strategies or solutions that can be modified in the light of experience and on-the-ground feedback.\(^{190}\)

The Australian report concludes that wicked problems require governmental and non-governmental agencies to work together in new ways and through novel processes. This shift must be facilitated through:

- supportive structures and processes;
- a supportive culture and skills base;
- facilitative information management and infrastructure;
- appropriate budget and accountability frameworks; and
- ongoing forums of exchange.\(^{191}\)

The Committee has integrated the Australian framework and suggested approaches into the targets, milestones and actions for the structural supports to our bridge. Together, they suggest that collaboration and coordination will be required to reach equal justice.

Is a ‘Superhero’ Required?

The Committee has concluded that partial solutions are incapable of addressing the current access to justice gap and effectively contributing to equal justice. This conclusion is supported by the wicked problems literature\(^{192}\), which emphasizes the importance of holistic thinking and the need to confront the big picture and deal with the interrelationships between a range of causal factors and policy objectives. This report rejects the status quo and calls for action on a more fundamental scale as required by the depth, breadth and urgency of the problem.

At the Summit, there was a consensus that we need access to justice champions. The role of those champions is discussed in the sections that follow. Justice innovation literature\(^{193}\) suggests that access champions come forward organically, often from a grassroots perspective, armed with a keen understanding of a specific access problem, a creative solution and an unwillingness to take ‘no’ for an answer.

The question remains though whether champions will be enough, as those people do emerge from time to time. It seems that instead something truly extraordinary may be required to achieve our ambitious shared objectives. The Committee found

\(^{190}\) Ibid at 9-12.

\(^{193}\) See, for example, the work at Hiil, supra notes 132, 134 and 143.
Balancing the scales itself asking: is a superhero required? This image is hard to avoid, as a special champion would need extraordinary powers and be fervently dedicated to protecting the public. Rather than a comic book hero, however, the Committee is suggesting someone more like a Tommy Douglas and his heroic efforts to build a universal healthcare system in Canada. He is the iconic social policy superhero.

In posing the question this way, the Committee does not mean to trivialize the efforts required. The Committee believes it is important to encourage the latent champion in each of us and reiterate the invocation that we all need to think systemically and act locally. At the same time, the notion of superpowers is appropriate to describe the effort required to reach equal justice. In particular, the Committee is concerned that change efforts will continue to flounder as no one individual or entity is responsible for ensuring access to justice in Canada. And so, our targets include a typically Canadian proposal for an additional function in the justice system: an access to justice commissioner in each jurisdiction with modest but novel ‘super’ powers.

Building Public Engagement and Participation

Civil justice is a low priority for the Canadian public, and so has low political priority. Polling shows broad public support in principle for legal aid, but still there is no public outrage at the current deficiencies, or any broad movement urging change. Criminal justice issues tend to dominate the media and have more public profile. The lack of awareness of the importance of a functioning justice system for non-criminal matters means civil justice issues receive little attention. Overall, justice concerns have lower priority than other parts of our social safety net, notably education and healthcare.

Those who most need publicly funded legal services often have no voice in determining priorities, because poor people have little political capital, as do other vulnerable groups affected by inadequate access, including, for example, children.

In addition, many people believe that legal problems happen to other people, not them. Another common misperception is that most people’s justice needs are already met. There is a widespread disconnect between Canadians and their justice system: there is no sense of ownership. The public feels disenfranchised and helpless to change the system. Our elected representatives broadly reflect the population, and are unlikely to act on issues that they know are unimportant to their constituents.

As the statistics in Part I vividly illustrate, justice has lost ground relative to other important social programs. Political attention to equal justice is unlikely given the current lack of public recognition or support. So, increased public engagement is a necessary condition for reaching equal justice. This engagement could be fostered by governments regularly using community roundtables, town hall meetings, or other public gatherings to engage in dialogue with the public about justice. Governments should be able to demonstrate that the public perspective has informed the foundations of the justice system.

Changing the Conversation

The long-term strategy for increasing public engagement with the justice system and building a public commitment to equal justice is linked to improving individual legal capability, beginning with early education to build law as a life skill. The objective is for Canadians to have a greater sense that they own the justice system, that it’s a system intended to serve them, rather than a system for lawyers and judges to exert power over them. In the shorter term, a comprehensive public engagement campaign is required. We need a convincing answer when people ask: “why should I care about equal justice?” While each justice stakeholder group has a role, the legal profession and the CBA have a leadership role in developing this campaign.
Lack of public interest in justice system reform is further harmed by conflicting messages about access to justice. When justice leaders speak out they are often accused of acting out of self-interest. Messages that emphasize or reinforce a negative or jaundiced view of legal and court processes, the legal profession and the judiciary have great currency. Genn has noted with dismay this “damaging justice rhetoric” that “presents court proceedings as an unnecessary drain on public resources, and public funding for civil and family disputes through legal aid as an incitement to litigate rather than a means of facilitating access to justice.”

Justice system stakeholders can contribute to this negativity and confusion in a dialogue marked by finger-pointing and attributing fault to others.

The Envisioning Equal Justice initiative focused on changing the conversation among justice system stakeholders to move beyond damaging rhetoric arising from competition over scarce resources and protecting turf. The next stage is to change the conversation further by expanding it to include more members of the public in more meaningful ways.

Summit participants also emphasized the need to stop “singing to the choir” and develop mechanisms to engage the public more directly and open the discussion up significantly. People need to know that:

- They are not immune from legal problems: “it” can happen to “you”
- Everyone will likely be touched by the justice system at some point
- The value of legal help when people have serious legal problems
- The benefits to society as a whole when we provide equal justice
- That justice needs can be as important as health care needs
- The economic and social cost of doing nothing.

Another key message is the strong interconnection between health, education and justice; understanding that spending on justice will save money elsewhere (in addition to avoiding suffering). Also, equal justice is interrelated to other more accepted social goals, such as alleviating child poverty, improving the GDP and dealing properly with mental health issues.

Summit participants were also clear that the goal must be community ownership of the justice system, and that can only be achieved through active engagement. The public is very much a part of the justice community. Justice system stakeholders are not instigating dialogue with the public but rather tapping into a justice dialogue that is already going on. The problem is that the two conversations – the justice system dialogue and the community justice dialogue – are disconnected. We need to replace the weak links between the two conversations with a strong connection.

The point is not to challenge and resist in order to preserve the status quo, but to engage in the debate, to argue for the benefits of public justice while recognizing where and how the public justice system and legal practice needs to change and to offer a realistic program for improvement in order to meet the needs of disputing parties seeking justice through the legal system.

Increased public engagement is a necessary condition for reaching equal justice, but politicians are unlikely to embrace the issue given the lack of public recognition or support. The importance of strategies that bring the public into conversations about equal justice featured prominently in the Summit discussions about obstacles to change and how to overcome them.

targeted for change.” At a Summit workshop, Mary Ellen Hodgins, an entrepreneur and a public representative involved in several access to justice initiatives, emphasized practical reasons for engaging the public as partners in justice dialogue. Public engagement builds trust, reduces the potential for unintended consequences, builds capacity and contributes to innovation because the public offers valuable contributions. In addition, it is the right thing to do because people are part of the justice community.

Increasing Public Participation

Initiatives to build general public understanding of, support for, and ownership in the justice system is one key strategy. A second is to develop effective means for public engagement and participation as active justice system stakeholders.

HiiL’s Innovating Justice handbook emphasizes the importance of involving users early on and throughout the process. While acknowledging that this takes time, it is essential because it is only by listening to the people involved in a judicial process that we will be able to understand the problems from the perspective of users. People using justice system services “are not always able to clearly articulate their deepest needs”. The main mechanism employed today is user satisfaction surveys but these only scratch the surface. Actual conversations may be required to explore past and present experiences, attitudes and emotions surrounding these topics. The justice system has much to learn from market research and other more sophisticated tools and approaches.

Pain is a mere signal. It is crucial to diagnose exactly what hurts most and what the needs are. So involving users from the outset, and throughout the process, is not just ‘a good idea’ or something ‘to be aimed for’, it is essential to the development of an efficient effective, innovation.

HiiL, Innovating Justice, note 134

The broader question is how to fully engage the public in a way that will build the sense of ownership required for fundamental change. This challenge seems particularly daunting given the paucity of policy dialogue in Canada. Those working for improvements are not an organized national movement, but advocates who are already often overworked and underpaid.

In A Voice for All: Engaging Canadians for Change, the Institute on Governance has developed a framework to facilitate active participation and citizen engagement. Principles include shared agenda-setting by all participants, a relaxed timeframe for deliberation, an emphasis on value-sharing rather than debate, and consultative practices based on inclusiveness, courtesy and respect. In her remarks at the Summit, Maria Campbell advocated for steps to recognize and transcend the power differentials between institutional and professional voices and community voices. Conversations based on reciprocity, where the contribution of all perspectives and forms of knowledge is equally recognized and valued is key. Steps must be taken to ensure the dialogue is culturally appropriate and addresses barriers to communication. As Campbell pointed out: “Our language is different. Because I speak English doesn’t mean that I understand or comprehend what you’re talking about.”

For its community consultations, the Committee developed a consultative framework integrating the principles outlined in this section. The framework is appended to this report.

In facing the difficult challenge of beginning to build greater public engagement and ownership of the justice system, successful existing models can serve as the foundation for concerted, widespread efforts. We can also learn from successful campaigns to change public policy and public behaviour in other fields, such as changing the cultural acceptability of drinking and driving, and smoking in public places.

Smaller scale successes have been made in justice system public engagement strategies. In her post-Summit reflections, Anne Beveridge, a long time legal aid lawyer in British Columbia, attributed the decline in public support for legal aid to the removal of local community law offices, which had carried out regular extensive consultations with local community members. As a result, the community felt they “owned” the province’s legal aid plan and successfully went to bat for it when the government sought to cut services in 1997. Community law offices are essential to community engagement.

More recently, the CBA British Columbia Branch successfully raised the profile of legal aid and other access to justice issues through a concerted public engagement campaign. At the Summit, Matthews said that an important and promising insight gained through the campaign is that the highest support for legal aid comes from those with the most knowledge. After a 25-minute phone conversation, with the interviewer mainly asking questions, the interviewees’ favourability rating, their personal commitment to having tax dollars support legal aid, went way up. This was true across all demographics.

As members of the justice community, we need to change the way we talk and how we act. Our goal is an equal, inclusive justice system that everyone can take part in. To start, we need to listen to the public perspective and create inclusive forums for dialogue and accountability structures. True public ownership of the justice system will require more than enhanced consultation and dialogue though. We must also transform accountability structures to include public representatives. Right now, Canadians think of the justice system as belonging to judges, lawyers and the government – this has to change. Canadians must perceive the justice system, including the courts, as belonging to them.

Targets: By 2025, all provincial and territorial governments engage in dialogues with the public (e.g. community roundtables, town hall meetings) on a regular basis and demonstrate how the public perspective informs justice system policies and processes, innovations and reforms.

By 2020, Canadians have a greater sense of public ownership of the justice system.

Milestones:
- All governments hold dialogue sessions with the public (e.g. community roundtables, town hall meetings), in partnership with community groups, at least three to five times per year
- A principled framework for community dialogue (e.g. inclusion, respect, reciprocity) integrating evidence-based best practices is in place
- Justice reform captures the public perspective which informs policy and process development, innovation and reform to the justice system
- A suggestion from a member of the public is championed by an appropriate justice system participant and is successfully implemented

Actions:
- The CBA works with other justice system stakeholders to develop a public engagement strategy, including an interactive “My Justice System” campaign to learn more about public expectations of the justice system and to seek out concrete proposals for access to justice reforms
• Provincial and territorial governments build on the consultative practices of legal aid providers and legal clinics to identify justice system user groups who should be included in consultation processes
• All justice system governing boards and advisory committees include more than one public representative and operate according to inclusive guidelines for communication and consultation
• Justice system stakeholders collaborate to increase the number and types of mechanisms to receive feedback from people accessing the justice system, including online discussion forums and surveys of people denied services; feedback is taken into account in reform strategies

Building a Coherent Civil Justice System: Collaboration and Effective Leadership

There is effectively no coherent civil justice system in Canada. Fragmentation is to some degree a necessary consequence of institutional and individual independence of the parts of our justice system – the courts and judges, the legal profession and lawyers and the legislative and executive branches of government. Independence of the judiciary and of the bar and the separation of powers between branches of government are foundational principles of Canadian democracy that must be steadfastly preserved. At the same time, a rigid application of these principles can act as a shield against justice innovation and prevent necessary collaboration and coordination.

This overall lack of coherence is replicated on a practical level. The diffuse and complex nature of delivery of civil justice services is exacerbated by the lack of effective mechanisms for coordination and collaboration. These conditions also exist in the criminal justice system, but it has achieved a higher degree of coherence through focused collaboration.

During the Summit closing plenary session, Colleen Cattell Q.C., a Vancouver mediator, asked participants to consider the unseen or unspoken interests that inhibit collaboration in the justice system. She used the image of an iceberg, with the tip above the water representing expressed positions, and the bulk hidden under the surface to suggest possibly unarticulated interests or fears at stake. A number of common themes emerged from these small group discussions at the closing plenary, shown in the “Iceberg of Hidden Hurdles to Justice Innovation” diagram below.

Acknowledging these barriers is an important first step in working together to overcome them.

This need for collaboration and cooperation is pervasive. None of us can meet these challenges alone. Many conversations begin with issues about authority and independence. I say let’s start with the problems and the solutions. Of course we have to be careful about roles and responsibilities and about the independence of the bar, the bench and the administration. But let us not start the conversation there. Let’s identify the problems together and try to solve them together, respecting our roles and responsibilities but never forgetting our shared responsibility to the administration of justice.

Justice Thomas Cromwell, Keynote Speech at Envisioning Equal Justice Summit, April 2013
Hidden Hurdles to Justice Innovation

What’s below the surface?

- Fear of innovation
- No reward for taking risks
- Unwillingness to expose failures and inefficiencies
- No one has/takes responsibility (or joint responsibility), so everyone expects someone else will “do something”
- Finger pointing, blaming
- Fear of losing turf - institutional self-interest
- Overwhelmed by complexity and extent of the problem
- Self-preservation, fear of loss of control, status and work (e.g. fear of becoming a discount store lawyer)
- Sense of entitlement – we know more/better than people asking for change
- Belief that some issues are untouchable/shouldn’t be questioned (e.g. judicial independence, role of law schools, self-regulation of profession, necessity of lawyers being sole providers of legal representation)

In addition to justice stakeholders’ fears and interests, the current situation is exacerbated by our underdeveloped capacity for collaboration despite the clear human, social and economic costs of unequal justice. Summit participants noted that justice system players too often act in ‘silos’ and the lack of clear common goals or visions act as inhibitors to effective collaboration. We must acknowledge that we in the legal profession are better at competing than collaborating or recognizing our interdependencies. This competition reinforces inefficiencies and leaves out the broader community. Inertia and lethargy are natural responses to these conditions and active steps are required to overcome these tendencies and complexities to facilitate collaboration.

However, collaboration alone will not create a coherent civil justice system. Effective leadership is also essential. At the Summit, participants considered the question, ‘how can we go forward when we don’t know where we’re going’ because:

- The justice system is a body without a brain.198
- We lack management capacity: there is no CEO of the justice system making coherent decisions.
- We need leaders, champions for change.
- There is plenty of diagnosis, but little attention to how to translate it into change/action.

If the justice system is a body without a brain or an organization without a CEO, then genuine leadership in the access to justice field must be developed to fill this void.

The Committee proposes that we build our capacity for collaboration and effective leadership in the civil justice system through two main avenues:

- establishing permanent and ongoing national, provincial, territorial and local collaborative structures; and
- the appointment of access to justice commissioners.

The expectation is that by 2020 these collaborative structures and commissioners would be functioning at a high level. A committee or commission can be set up quickly, but time is needed to develop the skills and processes necessary to work together effectively, cultivate membership, refine mandates, and gather resources and so on. The following discussions bring together the Committee’s insights on what is required to meet this target of effective collaboration and leadership.

Equal justice will also be advanced through networking, sharing information and communication between collaborative forums. This is addressed in the next section on building the capacity for justice innovation. Here, the focus is on the skills, processes and structures needed to facilitate collaboration in the justice system.

Collaborative Skills, Processes and Structures

The National Action Committee is an important forum for bringing together justice system stakeholders, including a member of the public. Other collaborative forums are needed at the provincial, territorial and local levels. During the Summit, this requirement was expressed as the need for “a neutral umbrella leadership body to oversee justice system reform and bring together stakeholders”. Some jurisdictions have had access to justice committees for a specified period or for specific initiatives. These include two Alberta initiatives; the Justice Policy Advisory Committee and the Safe Communities Initiative. Lessons can be learned from the successes and the failures of these types of initiatives. At the Summit, Kurt Sandstorm, Q.C., Assistant Deputy Minister, Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, highlighted three specific lessons: establish separate forums for civil and criminal justice issues, keep collaborative structures small and develop a focused mandate and action plan.

Collaboration requires more than setting up committees. Certainly to reach equal justice we must develop collaborative skills, processes and structures. But, we also need to fundamentally change the way we work and carry out the business of justice. We need to build equal justice communities from the ground up, breaking down siloes and replacing them with effective means of communication, coordination and cooperation within and across sectors of the justice system.

The first step to facilitate working across organizational boundaries includes inter-organization mapping on a given issue, strategic reviews and creating a shared understanding of problems across organizations.

The Australian Report on tackling wicked problems states the social complexity that accompanies nearly all such problems means “a lack of understanding of the problem can result in different stakeholders being certain that their version of the problem is correct”. Achieving a shared understanding of the dimensions of the problem and different perspectives among external stakeholders who can contribute to a full understanding and comprehensive response to the issue is crucial. The report goes on to say that, “... the Holy Grail of effective collaboration—is in creating shared understanding about the problem, and shared commitment to the possible solutions.” From this perspective, solving a wicked problem is fundamentally a social process: “Having a few brilliant people or the latest project management technology is no longer sufficient.”

Lessons from the US Access to Justice Commission Experience

In the US, Chief Justices are considered the ‘stewards’ of the entire justice system. Many Chief Justices have established access to justice commissions (ATJC) to enable them to work with other stakeholders to advance equal justice. In 2010, the US Conference of Chief Justices adopted a resolution supporting the “aspirational goal that every state and United States territory have an active access to justice commission or comparable body.” The resolution was in large measure a response to the remarks of Professor Laurence H. Tribe, Senior Counselor for Access to Justice, US Department of Justice. Tribe championed access to justice commissions as having achieved remarkable results and referred to them “as one of the most important justice-related developments in the past decade.”

In January 2011, the US Conference of Chief Justices adopted a resolution entitled “Leadership to Promote Equal Justice”. The resolution

We desperately need a more cooperative and collaborative approach - within sectors (eg among PLE providers, pro bono groups, etc); across sectors (judges, lawyers, court administrators, legal aid, etc); and across jurisdictions (eg. why develop essentially the same materials for self represented litigants 13 times?)

acknowledges that under the US constitutional structure, the judicial branch “shoulders primary leadership responsibility to preserve and protect equal justice and take action necessary to ensure access to the justice system for those who face impediments they are unable to surmount on their own.” Given the importance of judicial leadership and commitment, the resolution urges Chief Justices to establish partnerships with state and local bar organizations, legal service providers and others to:

1. Remove impediments to access to the justice system, including physical, economic, psychological and language barriers;
2. Develop viable and effective plans to establish or increase public funding and support for civil legal services for individuals and families who have no meaningful access to the justice system; and
3. Expand the types of assistance available to self-represented litigants, including exploring the role of non-attorneys.

At the Summit, Steven Grumm, Director of the ABA Resource Centre for Access to Justice Initiatives provided an overview and analysis of the US experience with ATJCs to date. The ABA defines ATJCs as:

- A blue ribbon commission or similar formal entity comprised of leaders representing, at minimum, the state courts, the organized bar and legal aid providers. Its membership may also include representatives of law schools, legal aid funders, the legislature, the executive branch, and federal and tribal courts, as well as stakeholders from outside the legal and government communities.
- Its core charge is to expand access to civil justice at all levels for low-income and disadvantaged people in the state (or equivalent jurisdiction) by assessing their civil legal needs, developing strategies to meet them, and evaluating progress. Its charge may also include expanding access for moderate-income people.
- Its charge is from or recognized by the highest court of the state or equivalent jurisdiction; the highest court and the highest levels of the organized bar are engaged with the ATJC’s efforts and the ATJC reports regularly to them.
- Its primary activities relate to planning, education, resource development, coordination, delivery system enhancement, and oversight. It is not primarily a funder or direct provider of legal assistance.
- It meets on a regular basis and has ongoing responsibility for carrying out its charge.200

In some cases, ATJCs have been established by statute; more frequently they are created by state Supreme Court rule or order in response to a petition or request by the state bar, sometimes with formal support from other key stakeholder entities.

ATJCs have focused on a range of activities:

- Increasing public awareness of the civil legal needs of low-income people and the importance of civil legal assistance—through legal needs studies and other reports, hearings, evaluation reports and public awareness campaigns;
- Expanding efforts to educate federal legislators about the need for increased LSC funding and state policymakers about the need to augment state-level funding—through state appropriations, filing-fee surcharges, voluntary or mandatory bar-dues contributions, improvements in IOLTA (Interest on Lawyers Trust Accounts), and other means;
- Increasing pro bono participation among private attorneys—through pro bono initiatives such as mandatory reporting, rule changes, pro bono attorney—recruitment campaigns, websites, conferences, and state-wide data collection;
- Creating and expanding loan-repayment assistance programs for young attorneys with substantial student-loan debt, which serves as a barrier to taking lower-paid jobs in civil legal aid organizations;
- Assisting efforts to bring together the bar, courts, legal aid providers, and others to make

200 www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/administrative/legal_aid_indigent_defendants/lc_sclaid_atj_definition_of_a_commission.authcheckdam.pdf
the courts more accessible and user friendly and to address the challenges posed by the self-represented—through comprehensive plans, reports and evaluations, training and education, simplification of rules and forms, courthouse support, web- and technology-based tools, and other activities; and

- Developing new programs and state-wide collaborations to ensure effective coordination among providers, implement innovative technology-based systems and ensure systemic advocacy and services to special populations, such as immigrants and prisoners.

In Grumm's opinion, the main function and virtue of ATJCs "has to do with the fact that they sit at altitude and can break down some of the silos that other actors in legal system might be living in and not realizing that they're not communicating as well with their counterparts." The effectiveness of ATJCs comes down to a question of leadership, the personality and dedication of the Chief Justice. Another key to ATCJ's success is increased accountability. In almost all cases, ATCJs have to report annually, whether to legislature, the Supreme Court, and/or the bar association. This reporting feed pressures ATJCs to show concrete results. The greatest successes of ATJCs have been in advocating for additional funds for access to justice initiatives and services, particularly legal aid.

Grumm also outlined pitfalls and challenges experienced by some ATJCs, which tended to reflect the flipside of the advantages. For example, because ATJCs are blue ribbon committees operating at 'altitude', they can be removed from day to day problems and may therefore be better at creating strategic plans than carrying them out. Similarly, ATJCs focus on breaking down silos but can themselves project an air of elitism and may be perceived as exclusionary. Further, direct service providers have expressed concerns that an ATJC is just another player consuming time and funds and taking finite resources away from meeting the public's legal needs. This concern has been overcome where ATJCs have been successful in generating additional resources.

The ABA provides support to ATJCs through its Resource Centre for Access to Justice Initiatives, which serves as a hub for the exchange of information, and facilitates an annual meeting of heads of ATJCs in conjunction with the Equal Justice Conference. The Access to Justice Commission Expansion Project has established a fund from monies from private foundations to strengthen the ATJC movement nationally, facilitating the development of new ATJCs and enabling existing ATJCs to develop and test innovative projects. The fund makes grants to commissions for this purpose.

As part of the Access to Justice Support Project, the ABA has developed a number of access to justice tools, including a checklist and best practice guide. The checklist sets out common strategies employed to increase equal justice on several fronts: funding for civil legal assistance; pro bono; education, research, awareness; student loan repayment assistance; court access and pro se (SRLs); state agency administrative fairness; and program delivery and collaboration. The best practices guide recognizes that while no two states are alike, and every state's access to justice efforts must be geared to local circumstances, some basic lessons can be discerned and shared. The guide's twelve lessons from successful state access to justice efforts are set out below.

Several state ATJCs have prepared detailed handbooks for building access to justice communities. For example, leaders of the Washington Access to Justice Board have published a “roadmap for building an equal justice community”, providing step-by-step advice on building an access to justice structure at the state level.

12 Lessons for Effective Collaboration

1. Successful Access to Justice efforts are founded upon a strong partnership among the bar, the judiciary, and legal aid providers. Law schools can also be key partners, while representatives from outside the legal community can bring new perspectives and help broaden support.

2. Formal structures that are accountable to more than one partner can be more secure than informal structures or structures accountable to only one partner.

3. Judicial leadership – especially at the state Supreme Court level – greatly increases the effectiveness of Access to Justice initiatives.

4. Individual leadership is critically important for a successful Access to Justice effort.

5. New and emerging Access to Justice leaders should be cultivated.

6. Institutional commitment is necessary on the part of each of the key partners.

7. Assessing and publicizing accomplishments is a key task.

8. Access to Justice leaders should chart a compelling vision but avoid creating unreasonable expectations.

9. An effective staff capacity is essential for a successful Access to Justice effort.

10. Access to Justice structures should carefully consider how best to obtain meaningful input from client communities.

11. Access to Justice structures should be open and inclusive and place a priority on developing trust among the partners.

12. Partners should place a priority on promoting cooperation and consensus within their own community and strive to speak with one voice in public.

ABA Access to Justice Support:

Access to Justice Commissioners

The US experience with ATJCs is not directly transferable to Canada, particularly given the differences in the role of the judiciary and the Chief Justices on either side of the border.

Blue ribbon committees may not be the best model to drive substantive access to justice reform in Canada. The willingness and ability to exert genuine leadership is built on passion and commitment, not on status and position. As the ABA has stated: “many of the most effective leaders have been volunteers with no formal responsibility in this area, who simply developed an Access to Justice vision and brought others along. An individual’s institutional role is far less important than the willingness to make a commitment to do what is necessary to further Access to Justice goals.”204 As the ATJC experience shows, not all Chief Justices are cut out to be the champion for change. Further, most senior leaders of the bench and bar are very busy and unable to free up the time required by this endeavor.

Champions for change are likely to emerge at a local level in connection with specific reforms – that is why the Committee’s target includes not only system-wide collaborative structures but also collaboration at the local level on specific initiatives. Hiil has created an awards program to recognize innovation leaders, saying that “[i]nnovators are motivated to improve and to implement their innovations across borders. Nominees and applicants for the Innovating Justice Awards will be able to share their setbacks, successes and best practices.”205 Access to justice commissions or committees can cultivate and celebrate equal justice champions, but it is rare for a collective body to actually carry out this role.

Given these realities, the Committee has concluded that while federal, provincial and territorial committees along the lines of the US ATJCs are necessary to reach equal justice, they are not a sufficient measure. They are required to improve communication and coordination of efforts but do not guarantee the leadership and champions required for consistent, substantive change. As Muller pointed out at the Summit, current leaders of justice system organizations should not take the lead as it will likely result in “more of the same and no true collaboration.” Every member of an ATJC participates in her or his representative capacity bringing a unique and important perspective, but no one, including representatives of the public, represents the system as a whole.

The Committee is also concerned that ATJC would not be adequately resourced to carry out this important reform work. It is time to stop trying to bring about equal justice from the corner of our desks. Something new and distinctive is required to ensure progress on achieving reform goals, through regular communications and annual reports. It is not envisioned that access to justice commissioners would have a grievance or complaints function. Rather, the office would operate in a proactive fashion. Equal justice requires many champions and collaboration among equal justice communities, but also desperately needs concentrated, effective leadership that can only be offered through independent offices of access to justice commissioners in each jurisdiction.

First, unlike Apple, there really isn’t a CEO of the justice sector. There’s not one owner. I mean, who owns justice? Who’s the CEO, who directs the justice system? If there is a very clear CEO, I think it almost, by definition, would not be a justice system but a dictatorship.

Target: By 2020, effective, ongoing collaborative structures with effective leadership are well-established at the national, provincial, territorial and local levels, including through the appointment of access to justice commissioners.

Milestones:

- Access to justice commissioners are in place in every province and territory and at the federal level
- The performance of collaborative structures is reviewed every two years, with lessons and improvements integrated into their operations. Evidence about collaborative best practices is widely-shared.

Actions:

- The National Action Committee, its successor or another national organization is properly resourced as a national collaborative structure with a mandate to support and coordinate provincial and territorial efforts
- The National Action Committee, its successor or another national organization works with other justice system stakeholders, including provincial and territorial committees, to organize an annual or biennial national conference
- Provincial and territorial governments establish collaborative structures to bring together stakeholders and establish networks between local equal justice communities and task-based collaborative initiatives
- Access to justice leaders create local equal justice communities including pathways for communication and collaboration with other communities and initiatives

Building the Capacity for Justice Innovation

Our greatest challenge in reaching equal justice is addressing what the National Action Committee has identified as ‘the implementation gap’. The justice system’s capacity for innovation is underdeveloped and undernourished. For the most part we know what needs to happen, but we are not as clear on how to do it.

At the Summit, there was considerable discussion as to how we acknowledge that justice reform is hard, while facilitating dialogue about building capacity and creating an environment conducive to innovation. The centrepiece of this dialogue was a conversation between two international experts on justice innovation, Geoff Mulherin, Director of the Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales (LFNSW) and Sam Muller, Director of the Hague Institute for the Internationalisation of Law (HiIL). This section builds on that conversation and the published contributions of these two leading access to justice organizations, notably Innovating Justice and Legal Australia-Wide Survey.

Keys to Justice Innovation

Being Clear on Success Criteria

Among the most essential lessons learned about justice innovation is the necessity of being clear on what will constitute success. Muller used the example of the Millennium Development Goals as a clear set of success criteria for a complex policy problem: eradicating poverty. Progress has been made because the clear goals and sub-goals have become the focus of many organizations’ work. This initial stage is crucial: understanding the problem, understanding what you’re trying to innovate, and developing terms of reference as to what your innovation must achieve.

Mulherin also highlighted the importance of this step by comparing it to the first principle of war: selection and maintenance of the aim. He cautioned that it is rare to actually have a shared, agreed aim: “It’s actually harder than you think. We think we have concepts that we share. We don’t. People have conversations without ever agreeing exactly what the purpose of this is actually about.”

Note that the many quotations and references in the following section of the Report are not individually footnoted, but refer back to these two sources and conversations at the Summit. Innovating Justice, supra note 134; LAW Study, supra note 23.

What is success when you’re trying to put innovations into place in the justice system? What does it look like? How do we know we’re going to get there and how do we have the vision of where we want to end up?

Our vision of what we’re trying to achieve is often constrained by what we do: publishers publish, judges judge, advocates advocate, and so on. It is hard to move beyond these perspectives to really collaborate and agree on success criteria. Success criteria must be clear, unambiguous and measurable.

Connecting Macro and Micro Approaches

Justice innovation requires a balance between macro (top-down) and micro (bottom-up) approaches: again, we need to think systemically, act locally. Mulherin reports that most innovations are generated by the people working on the front line. For example, this might be the people working at a community legal centre, seeing the same problems day in and day out. Increased access to justice can mainly be characterized as: “a tentative, iterative buildup of micro-level changes in a general direction, preferably engaged or led by a group at the lower level, the community level, but supported by sufficient people at the top end to sort of bring that change through.”

Muller concurred with this description of the dynamic between micro and macro approaches to justice innovation. Change emanates from the bottom up: “The best innovations come from the people that face the same issue every single day and are so sick of it that they want to change it, so that’s where the innovators are.” At the same time, support is needed from the top to connect small scale innovations into broader change. Changes in one part of the justice system may be beneficial but incompatible with changes in other parts. We have to consider the inter-operability of technical systems. The challenge is to connect the macro and the micro: “the innovators need somehow to be clever to link to the top and … the top needs to be clever to empower those guys down below.”

Creating a Nurturing Ecosystem

Hiil’s Innovating Justice succinctly offers the key to success: Innovation requires an extensive ecosystem nurturing the process. Justice innovation experts have identified components of this ecosystem, including:

- Adopt a ‘Yes AND’, not a ‘Yes, BUT’ mentality
- Forget about the rules
- Treat “failure” as an entrée to adaptation and eventual success
- Be clear on who benefits: an innovation is not just an idea
- Nurture a champion
- Ensure the time is ripe
- Engage a critical mass
- Provide incentives and resources
- Cultivate a diversity of skills and knowledge and partnerships.

Innovation begins with a mindset and belief that change is possible. For many, this glimmer of possibility has been eroded by past failures or the sense that change is realistically impossible. HiIL refers to this as a “Yes, BUT” attitude, and suggests a “Yes, AND” approach is needed to generate ideas, build on those ideas, and establish and maintain a safe and creative environment.
Conditions that allow experimentation and create a safe environment are key. Innovation processes are not linear: sometimes a prototype will fail, but the reaction should be to adapt and make it a success, rather than give up. Rules have the opposite effect: they act as inhibitors of innovation. Rules are the centrepiece of the justice system, so it is a natural reflex for lawyers and judges to respond to change by saying ‘that’s against this rule or that principle’. But the HiiL work emphasizes that getting rid of rules is key: “Don’t think about those rules when you’re working on innovation and keep the end in mind. Always start with the end in mind – that should be our frame of reference.”

Muller pointed out that “a successful innovation is not the same as a good idea.” Innovations are always connected to “a very clear problem, a very clear need, or as we negatively say, huge pain somewhere. If there’s no huge pain, then it generally remains a great idea.” We need to be clear on who will benefit from the measure, what ‘pain’ it is going to assuage. Mulherin made the flipside of this point even more emphatically: it is imperative not to change only for the sake of change. Change is disruptive and disruption can have a disproportionate impact on members of society living in disadvantaged conditions. The bottom line here is ‘first do no harm’.

In HiiL’s analysis of successful justice innovations, a common factor was that each effort had what they call an ‘innovation champion’: “Somebody who does not stop against all odds. And it usually is a person or two or three people. A committee is never an innovator.” The Innovating Justice handbook contains numerous examples of such champions. At the Summit, Muller highlighted a Kenyan example of innovation to tackle delays in the criminal courts. The courts and legal profession developed many complex delay-reduction strategies, but the successful innovator was a young woman who championed a prison paralegal program, where prisoners were taught to offer assistance to other prisoners. He described her story: “she fought and fought and fought and fought and went on and on and on and you could imagine the resistance she had. It’s now being rolled out in more prisons. But it comes down to a person.”

Mulherin emphasized that timeliness is a factor. The time has to be ripe for a given innovation, and a critical mass from the broader community has to be engaged. In his view, “mere sympathy is not enough”, a specific innovation has to be moving in the same direction as a broader movement. This critical mass is needed to influence decision makers so that an environment at the top supports the innovation. The top does not have to be the champions, but the top does have to be supportive. The HiiL report points out that innovation comes in waves or patterns and describes the importance of “surfing the innovation wave.”

In the private sector, innovation is fostered through incentives and resourced through a research and development budget, data about the subject area, knowledge about the market and users, good research capacity, a vision with lots of diverse perspectives and teams with a variety of skills and smart partnerships. Muller contrasted this with the justice sector, where innovation is starved. We have no time for innovation. Regular overload of work, constant pressure to deliver services and meet deadlines and heavy administrative burdens are all obstacles to innovation. Further, a valid concern expressed during the Summit closing plenary was that resources to facilitate change likely mean cuts elsewhere.

Our knowledge base is very thin. We don’t know enough about what people want from the justice system and we have limited capacity to measure public satisfaction with service delivery in the justice sector. We know even less about how to effectively meet needs. In Mulherin’s summary of what it takes... to innovate he said: “I’d like to say also, ‘driven by research’ but I’m afraid it’s too often not the case for me to actually say that.”

Both within and across justice institutions, our skills tend to be homogeneous, while creativity requires diversity. Muller pointed out the justice system also lacks partnerships, for example, with academia and research bodies. In contrast, he noted that innovation in the IT sector includes endless, very creative partnerships between public and private sectors. Mulherin reinforced this point noting that: “Law is an opinion-based discipline. You are inculcated with … opinions when in actual fact we should be talking much more social science.” And it rarely happens that justice innovation is something one person can do alone.

HiIL’s Innovating Justice Model

HiIL offers advice on getting our “justice innovation act together” in Innovating Justice, a collection of best practices based on research, years of experience and interviews with leading justice innovators. The handbook breaks the innovation process into six phases and provides advice and examples for each phase. An overview of the HiIL model is presented in the form of the central questions to be posed and answered in each phase. This handbook should be at the top of our collective reading list.

‘Incubation’, bringing people with innovation expertise together in one environment, has proven an effective approach. HiIL has developed an incubator in the form of a ‘justice innovation lab’, with three main features. First, the lab provides a physical space where people can be away from their daily work to concentrate on developing an innovation. Second, it contains a ‘neutral lab chief’ responsible for facilitating the process, keeping the work focused and moving forward, and generally characterized by HiIL as a ‘process pitbull’. The third ingredient is a variety of clever processes and techniques to ensure diversity of participants in the session, to understand the problem, to assist in setting the terms of reference (success criteria) and evaluation framework, and so on.

Now, if I go to the average ministry of justice, you have rules, hierarchy, rigid budgets, you don’t know the users, you have lots of compartments, changing visions or no visions, homogeneity in general, excessive workload—all things that are very, very bad for innovation. So… I really think there are a number of fundamental things that we could change and should change if we want innovation in courts, if we want innovation in ministries of justice.

And you don’t need to be Einstein to know what has to change. How many courts in the world have an innovation budget or an R&D budget? How many judges have 5% of their time to experiment? How many courts have a real safe environment in which we can just try something out? How many ministries allow that? I don’t know very many and I think there’s a lot you could change in that sense.

Sam Muller, HiIL, at CBA Envisioning Equal Justice Summit

At the Summit, Muller described one of these processes: moving quickly from discussions to creating a prototype using techniques from the IT sector called ‘scrum’. Scrums involve blocking off a short period of time and creating a high pressure environment, with the goal of generating a prototype quickly.

Dedicated time in the lab is key. While the HiIL justice innovation lab is a physical lab, the same approach can be taken in a ‘metaphorical justice lab’.

Filling the Justice Innovation Gap

The Canadian justice system has dedicated few resources to, and has limited capacity for justice innovation. An efficient way to fill the remaining gap is to establish a dedicated centre for justice innovation with a mandate to foster and support initiatives across Canada. In addition, all justice system stakeholders, including law firms, need to increase their research and development capacities to explore ongoing innovations for the practice of law. Some service providers are beginning to offer assistance to law firms and other justice sector institutions. The CBA Legal Futures Initiative has initiated a conversation about prospects for innovation in legal practice, and is consulting widely to obtain a broad diversity of perspectives about better ways to serve the public. Two mechanisms that have been employed to facilitate innovation in other sectors and have begun to be employed in the justice community are dedicated funding for research and development, and through competitions such as the US Legal Services Corporation competitive challenge grants.

Targets: By 2025, justice system stakeholders have substantially increased their innovation capacities by committing 10% of time and budgets to research and development.

By 2020, Canada has a Canadian Centre for Justice Innovation.

Milestones:
- Justice innovation leaders are recognized and share their best practices with others
- Regular environmental scans of justice innovations in Canada and abroad are carried out
- All justice system stakeholders, including law offices, develop innovation plans, with definite interim targets to increase their research and development functions in line with a 10 year goal of 10%

Actions:
- The CBA Legal Futures initiative use the results of its work to facilitate enhanced networking and exchanges of information on practice innovation
- The CBA works with other justice system stakeholders to develop a partnership with the Hague Institute for the Internationalisation of Law
- The CBA works with other justice system stakeholders to develop options for establishing a Canadian Centre for Justice Innovation to support local initiatives
- Law firms adopt models of compensation for lawyers that reward innovation
- Law schools establish innovation think tanks and involve a broad range of justice system stakeholders, including members of the public, consultants and experts on justice innovation

Access to Justice Metrics
Access to justice metrics are critical to support justice innovation. In Part I, the Committee underscored the limited ability to give definitive answers to even the most basic inquiries about barriers to access. We have only fragmentary data and no capacity to pull it together to get a complete picture of access to justice in Canada. The absence of an evidentiary base for action, and shared views on what to measure and how to measure it are serious obstacles to achieving equal justice.

We all know the maxim ‘you can only manage what you can measure’. We are far from having access to justice metrics to measure justice system performance. The development of metrics is an important pillar supporting justice innovation. Metrics serve a range of purposes, from informing the public about the justice system and grounding the day to day decision making of justice system participants, to supporting policy making processes and change processes. Metrics enhance people’s choices, enable comparison and learning, increase transparency and create incentives for improving access to justice.

As emphasized in the section on keys to justice innovation, we need success criteria, but we also need to be able to measure progress in attaining those criteria. In addition to citing the Millennium Development Goals, Muller also highlighted the sustainable living plan developed by Unilever as a potential model for justice innovation. Unilever is a multinational consumer goods company with a clear environmental sustainability plan. The company tracks progress towards their detailed goals on their website using red, yellow and green lights. Metrics of this kind are a powerful information tool that can contribute significantly to transparency and public confidence.
As noted earlier, in its 1996 report, the CBA Systems of Justice Task Force decried the lack of basic management information, concluding that the paucity of information was both indicative of and related to one of the five main identified barriers to access: inadequate management tools and resources. Some progress has been made in improving court-based data collection. Most notable are the ‘Justice Dashboards’ in British Columbia, which report basic criminal justice statistics. Plans are underway to expand these dashboards to the civil justice realm.

Many organizations collect some data, but their approach and methods reflect their own business practices and the data is diffuse. There are ongoing initiatives to gather more sophisticated data, particularly in costing aspects of the justice system through the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice’s Cost of Justice initiative. Yet, we are far from a shared framework for gathering data, much less a sound knowledge base for justice system decision making. The Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges and Association of Legal Aid Plans have committed to developing a common management information collection framework.

Canada is not alone with underdeveloped justice system data and evidence, but a concrete action plan to remedy this situation is past due. These issues are canvassed more thoroughly in the Committee’s Discussion Paper on Access to Justice Metrics. There is a growing consensus that we need to invest time and money to address the shortcomings on this front, although with some remaining uneasiness over how these goals can be met.

The Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales has carried out pioneering work in this area in their “Data Digest” initiative, which collects, collates and analyzes data from the main public legal service providers (legal aid, community legal centres and so on). This initiative attracted the attention of the Australian government’s Access to Justice Task Force in 2009 paving the way for a more comprehensive initiative.

The Australian Attorney-General’s Department has embarked on a multi-year collaborative initiative to build a robust evidence base for the civil justice system, described as “a long-term project that aims to remedy the current lack of consistent and comparable data across the civil justice system.” This promising approach could serve as a model for a Canadian initiative. The Australian Attorney-General’s Department has stated that the project would need the commitment of all, or at least the key stakeholders in the civil justice system. The project will be a long-term one that will require stakeholders to engage and commit some resources, if only in terms of time. In May 2011, the Department hosted a symposium to discuss with stakeholders how to move forward with this initiative, and a further forum was held in May 2012. A working group of all civil justice system stakeholders and data experts is developing a framework to guide the collection of consistent data to create an evidence base for the civil justice system. A research team was commissioned to scan recent empirical research and develop draft objectives for the civil justice system. The working group has assessed the quality and coverage of existing data in the civil justice system, paving the way for further refinement of the data collection framework. At the Summit, Mulherin reported that while the project recognized the importance of state participation (since people’s legal problems and pathways do not neatly align with the federal division of powers), state governments have yet to fully come onboard with this initiative.

The Committee proposes that the federal government take the lead but work closely with all justice system stakeholders, with the goal of publishing a first report on Canadian access to justice metrics by 2020 and a comprehensive report by 2030.

Substantial feedback was received on the Committee’s Access to Justice Metrics discussion paper, both in writing and in a Summit workshop. These insights are summarized here and should be taken into account in structuring a Canadian initiative to develop performance measurements and an evidence base for the civil justice system:

211 http://www.ag.gov.bc.ca/justice-data/index.htm
• Community voices should be integrated into framing of access to justice metrics. The Committee integrated the perspectives of members of communities living in marginalized conditions into its vision of equal justice in Part II and throughout this report.

• Inclusivity should be a measure of access to justice. Hughes paper for the Summit provides details for a framework for measuring inclusivity in the civil justice system.²¹⁴

• It is critical to “not to just go where the light is brightest”, for example, by focusing on court data. Mulherin warned of the “temptation to count what we can. And the problem is that what you count becomes what’s important.” In particular, court data does not tell the whole access to justice story.

• The development of access to justice data and metrics is clearly a government responsibility, but the approach, framework and data collection methods have to be developed collaboratively with the commitment of key stakeholders, including the public. There is some tension between government and the judiciary about data collection that needs to be resolved.

• The framework should be developed on a national basis, with room for provincial and territorial adjustments as needed.

• The variety of metrics required includes needs measurements, efficiency metrics, outcome measurements, and inclusivity measures. Efforts must include a measure of low-income persons who do not proceed through the justice system. Client satisfaction measures are insufficient as measurements need to incorporate broader background and context.

• If we are going to measure access to justice, the tools must be good – poor measurement is worse than no measurement at all.

• Data collection can be time-consuming and we should avoid adding too much burden on individuals and small organizations that provide services.

• Data collection should be forward-looking. The development of protocols to commit to moving to common data collection over time, as systems are upgraded, is key.

• Privacy issues have to be taken into account; data sharing agreements must include agreements to conceal private data. The idea of “justice identifiers” like health insurance numbers that help to ensure privacy while satisfying the need for robust information base is under discussion.

• A phased approach is most practical, given concerns over the resources required and to overcome other barriers to moving forward.

Target: By 2020, the first annual access to justice metrics report is released; by 2030, this report is comprehensive.

Milestones:

• The federal government establishes a working group to develop a framework and action plan for the development of access to justice metrics

Actions:

• The CBA works with other justice system stakeholders to develop a proposal for assessment of the quality and coverage of existing data

• Building on initiatives of the Canadian Association of Provincial Courts and the Association of Legal Aid Plans, justice system stakeholders develop a protocol for the collection of a common standard data set

• The CBA encourages the courts and other key agencies in the justice sector to see the value of access to justice metrics and to commit to work to attain these targets

Strategic Framework for Access to Justice Research

Canada is plagued by a paucity of access to justice research. This gap exists in tandem with the poor state of justice data collection and evidence. The lack of high quality, publicly available data detracts from scholarship and the lack of scholarship contributes to the poor state of data, since empirical research will help to determine which types of data should be collected. Other barriers to research include: fragmentation of access to justice research across disciplines and under-development of interdisciplinary studies; lack of integration of recent methodological developments such as internet-based tools; and lack of connection between academics and practitioners.

At the Summit, Wayne Robertson, Executive Director of the Law Foundation of British Columbia, facilitated a roundtable discussion on a national access to justice research agenda. There, Mulherin summed up the current situation: past research, particularly the civil legal needs literature, has told us quite a bit about promising directions for reform. Now the focus should be on establishing evidence about what works and what works at what cost. The Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales has a ten year research plan to provide answers to these central questions. Preliminary literature reviews of international research concluded there is very little quality evaluative research that can offer a sound basis for identifying effective reform to address specific needs.

A national research strategy is needed, not in the sense of a centralized master plan but rather to ensure coordination, avoid duplication and enable researchers to build on each other’s efforts. Workshop participants affirmed the importance of quantitative, qualitative, empirical and anecdotal research, the latter being particularly powerful in motivating reform. The overarching priority is for research on what works to improve access to justice. More research should be carried out on a longitudinal and latitudinal basis.

Workshop participants also recognized that the research agenda engages numerous organizations and institutions: law schools and social science departments; law commissions and other agencies such as the Official Languages Commission, legal service providers, bar associations and so on. Attention is needed to build stronger bridges between academia and practitioners as the perception is that there is a “big gulf” between the two.

An ongoing American Bar Foundation initiative serves as a potential model for fostering access to justice research in Canada. In December 2012, the American Bar Foundation launched a multi-year initiative to “kick start a sustainable access to justice research capacity.” The workshop had three components: a poster session, a town-hall meeting; and a small by-invitation working session. The poster session and town-hall meeting were designed to bring together researchers and field professionals to discuss research needs and research findings. The workshop focused on three topics:

- The most important research questions, research needs, and/or knowledge gaps that exist today in access to justice research, services delivery, administration, and policy;
- Concrete research projects, including data sources, sites, partnerships, methods and funding; and
- Possible models for building a sustainable access to justice research program.

Workshop outcomes include a discussion paper on an access to justice research program, including research priorities and the development of a web-based network amongst researchers to facilitate ongoing discussion.

The Committee proposes that efforts be taken to double access to justice research by 2020, with a view to building to a sustainable national access to justice research agenda by 2025. Integral to this proposal is establishing a central independent research organization that assumes responsibility for developing and coordinating the required data sources and research activities. These proposals work in conjunction with the targets for increased research in law schools and for government-led initiatives to build an evidence base on the civil justice system.

A national access to justice research framework to contribute to equal justice should encompass three main objectives:

- generate new high quality research activity;
- ensure the coordination of research efforts; and
- improve the communication of research results, including aggregating and synthesizing research findings and program evaluations to make this information more accessible to decision makers and in policy-making processes and forums for public dialogue.
Targets:
By 2025, Canada has a sustainable access to justice research agenda with four minimum components:

a) available, high quality data that supports empirical study of effectiveness of measures to ensure access to justice

b) a central independent research organization that assumes responsibility for developing and coordinating the required data sources and research activities

c) effective mechanisms through which researchers and people in the field collaborate and coordinate research activities, and

d) ongoing commitment to and adoption of best practices in access to justice research.

By 2020, the amount of access to justice research conducted in Canada has doubled.

Milestones:

- A central research organization continues to conduct – or support and coordinate – initiatives that synthesize and coordinate existing, and generate new research activity, including research that can inform policy

- A central research organization establishes – or supports the establishment of – a mechanism and methods for amassing quality data to support empirical access to justice research

Actions:

- The CBA, law foundations and other justice system stakeholders hold a workshop that provides an inventory of current and planned access to justice research initiatives, facilitates a dialogue between researchers and practitioners and considers potential mechanisms to coordinate existing and generate new research activity

- The CBA, law foundations, law faculties and other justice system stakeholders identify or develop a central organization that is able and willing to coordinate efforts to develop a national research agenda on an initial basis

- The central research organization establishes international collaboration networks with access to justice research institutes including the Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales and the American Bar Foundation

Reinvigorated National/Federal Government Role

This report sets targets and actions that depend on strong national leadership on access to justice reform. While provincial and territorial governments have primary responsibility for the day to day functioning of the justice system, the federal government also has a critical role. Like healthcare, justice is a shared governmental responsibility. A reinvigorated federal role is imperative if we are to reach equal justice.

This needed shift is clearly reflected in declining financial contributions to the legal aid system across Canada in real terms. The federal government has primary or major jurisdictional responsibilities in criminal law, family law, immigration law, and assisting in ensuring basic needs are met through social security programs such as employment benefits and the Canada Pension Plan. Yet over the past two decades, the federal government has taken an increasingly limited view of its responsibility for ensuring access to justice in these or any areas of law. The federal government has fostered some access to justice initiatives through time-limited investment in justice innovations through the legal aid renewal fund and the existing justice innovation fund. Limited project or ‘pilot project’ funding, while helpful, does not come close to mitigating the damage to the justice system by federal withdrawal from access to justice. The last time the federal government was actually an equal 50/50 partner was 1990/1991.215

The CBA, provincial and territorial governments and other organizations have pressed the federal government to meet its responsibilities and to shoulder a significant share of the additional fiscal commitments required to ensure that the Canadian justice system is equally accessible to all. For example in June 2007, all provincial and territorial justice ministers united to call for increased federal funding for legal aid, calling on the federal government “to pay its fair share as a partner in the justice system.”216 At that time, several of the provinces and territories estimated that their contribution to legal aid was four times that of the federal government. Importantly, this position was adopted by provincial and territorial ministers representing governments led by all major political parties.

Additional support for a renewed federal government role is based on the constitutional commitment to essential public services of reasonable quality across Canada, a commitment that can only be ensured through a robust national access to justice policy. Further, as discussed throughout this report, we now have a strong and growing understanding of the detrimental impact of unresolved legal problems on people’s well-being, an impact particularly profound on people living in marginalized conditions or who are otherwise vulnerable. Renewed funding for legal aid is critical, but federal leadership and support is required on other facets of justice innovation. Specifically, change can be achieved or supported through national initiatives such as the development of access to justice metrics and a centre for justice innovation.

National governments in other federal states have taken a stronger and more visible role in ensuring equal justice, despite sharing responsibility for these matters with state governments. Notably, the Australian and US national governments are much more active on the access to justice front compared to Canada. In March 2010, the US Department of Justice established the Access to Justice Initiative (ATJ) to address the access to justice crisis in the criminal and civil justice system. ATJ's mission is to help the justice system efficiently deliver outcomes that are fair and accessible to all, regardless of wealth and status. ATJ staff works in the Department of Justice, across federal agencies, and with state, local and tribal justice system stakeholders to increase access to lawyers and legal assistance, and to improve the justice delivery systems that serve people unable to afford lawyers. The initiative is led by Laurence Tribe, who reports to President Obama, underscoring the importance of these issues.

The Australian Attorney-General’s Department has been even more proactive, working steadily to increase equal justice since a landmark 1996 report on access to justice. For example, the Department has adopted a strategic framework for access to justice and has embarked upon a number of major initiatives, including a national partnership agreement on legal aid and building an evidence-based civil justice system, described above.

215 Currie, supra note 39.
The Committee suggests that this target is achievable by 2025, with an interim target of reinstating federal funding for legal aid to 1994 levels by 2020. Equal justice is about more than only the administration of justice in a province or territory: it is about the health, safety and security of all residents of Canada and ensuring good governance through a fair and effective legal system. These are national concerns, both as a matter of constitutional division of powers and good public policy. There is a growing consensus that re-engagement of the federal government in this field is imperative. The federal government can, should and must be a full partner in ensuring an equal inclusive justice system.

Targets:

By 2025, the federal government is fully engaged in ensuring an equal, inclusive justice system.

By 2020, the federal government reinstates legal aid funding to 1994 levels and commits to increases in line with national legal aid benchmarks.

Milestones:

- The federal government commits to steady increases in contributions to legal aid funding including returning to 50% cost-sharing in criminal matters and establishing a dedicated civil legal aid contribution.
- The federal government is a leader in supporting access to justice innovation.

Actions:

- The federal government commits to supporting justice innovation by taking a leadership role in building the evidence base necessary to develop access to justice metrics, appointing an access to justice commissioner, supporting the creation of a centre for justice innovation and funding access to justice research.
- The federal government makes funding for civil legal aid transparent and works with provincial and territorial governments and justice system stakeholders to regenerate legal aid.

CBA as an Access to Justice Leader

The CBA has contributed to access to justice in Canada since its inception, and improving access to justice is a core to the Association’s mandate. CBA contributions over the years have included task force reports leading to the adoption of policy statements on court reform, civil justice reform, administrative justice reform, equality in the legal profession and the administration of justice. Advocacy efforts have been based on these policies. In particular, the CBA has been active in lobbying for the establishment, protection and promotion of a national legal aid system for both criminal and civil matters. Efforts on this front have included numerous reports and resolutions, advocacy campaigns in collaboration with other organizations and test case litigation and various interventions. The consistent focus has always been on ensuring access to justice for low income people through effective legal aid services. For example, the CBA adopted a Charter of Public Legal Services in 1993 founded on the premise that for certain matters; legal aid is an essential public service akin to healthcare. More recently, the CBA has taken steps to foster pro bono work within the profession. CBA Branches are also active on these fronts.

The CBA established this Access to Justice Committee in 2011 with a view to consolidating and enlarging its work on these issues. The CBA fills an important role in national access to justice reform efforts but a stronger organizational commitment is required for the CBA to become an access to justice leader.

The Committee is committed to take action on six fronts, working in conjunction with other CBA entities, committed members and outside organizations:

- Encourage greater collaboration between justice system stakeholders, including the public and coordinate of initiatives in a strategic framework;

• Develop and revise CBA policies to support improvements in the public and private delivery of legal services;

• Partner with the CBA Legal Futures Initiative on elements of its work that relate to education, practice and regulatory innovations that could have an impact on access to justice;

• Foster greater public ownership of access to justice issues;

• Develop tools for advocacy geared to improving publicly funded access to justice, including legal aid; and

• Support and encourage CBA members to enhance the legal profession’s contributions to equal justice through the practice of law.

The priority given to access to justice issues has waxed and waned over the years – a natural cycle in the life of a professional association with a broad mandate, operating on member-driven initiatives. The Committee proposes that the CBA takes the necessary steps to ensure that it is in a position to be an access to justice leader, by increasing its capacity to support initiatives in this field.

Targets: By 2020, the CBA has increased its capacity to provide support to access to justice initiatives

Milestones:

• The CBA provides support to its members so they can participate actively in increasing equal access to justice

• The CBA takes a leadership role in encouraging public engagement with the justice system and changing the conversation in support of achieving equal justice

• The CBA continues and expands its collaboration with other justice system stakeholders, including members of the public, in support of inclusive access initiatives

Actions:

• The CBA substantially increases resources provided to access to justice initiatives

EPILOGUE:
Imagining 2030

This report has set out the Committee's vision for reaching equal justice, framed as 31 concrete, measurable targets to be achieved between 2020 and 2030. This vision is ambitious, but possible. The road to achieving these targets may appear long and difficult to navigate, but it can be travelled one step at a time, each of us doing our part, thinking systemically and acting locally. The Committee has initiated a description of this journey through some examples of actions intended to get us started and by setting out a few milestones we can aim to achieve along the way. There is no question that action must be initiated right away to join ongoing efforts – if not, we are likely to face a situation in 2030 that is dramatically worse for access to justice.

Despite the Committee's best attempt to offer concrete vision of equal justice, it still remains difficult to fully picture the transformation required to move from the dire state of access to justice in Canada today to the envisioned world of 2030, where the justice system is equally accessible to all, regardless of means, capacity or social situation. What does 100% accessibility look like?

To take this envisioning process one step further, the Committee will return to the stories of the nine people denied equal access to justice in Part I, to illustrate the impact of transformed paths and outcomes following our successful efforts toward equal justice.

So, imagine the year is 2030, and the justice system takes into consideration different legal needs, providing timely, holistic and personalized assistance to achieve lasting and just outcomes. People are empowered to manage their own legal matters, with a strong emphasis on prevention where feasible and public participation in overseeing the justice system. As a result, people feel a strong connection to the justice system, and a strong sense of ownership. Practices are evidence-based and the justice system is a nurturing environment for innovation. It consists of learning organizations committed to continual improvement.
Remember Winsome?

The 75 year old housecleaner who co-signed for her grandson’s car loan? She didn’t understand what she signed and when her grandson fell behind in his payments she could not access legal information or advice so she panicked and paid $2500 from her meagre savings to pay the debt.

Imagine instead that Winsome saw a notice for legal capability training at the local library. She signed up, for two hour classes on four Saturdays. When her grandson asks her to co-sign for a car loan, she wants to help, but remembers what she learned. She insists on taking the documents home to read them carefully before she signs. She stops at the library and uses the legal information website that she’d learned about in her training course, to find out what would be involved in signing the papers. When she gets frustrated because she isn’t used to working on a computer, someone at the library is available to help. Then, she stops by the courthouse, and is referred to a consumer advocacy centre staffed by pro bono lawyers. She calls them, and they make a suggestion. Winsome and her grandson return to the local dealership and she agrees to sign if the dealership removes the clause that gives it a mortgage on her home and adds a clause agreeing to give her two weeks’ notice of any problems before they begin their usual process. The salesperson knows Winsome and her grandson and agrees.

Later, when she receives notice that her grandson is behind by $2500 in his payments, she talks to him. Her grandson explains that he was waiting for his income tax return and he didn’t think the car dealership would act so quickly. Winsome writes the cheque for $2500 and mails it to the company, but her grandson pays her back two weeks later. He promises it will not happen again.
Remember Phuong?

She inadvertently left a drugstore without paying for prescriptions she had picked up. Then she pled guilty to a charge of shoplifting when she couldn’t get legal aid. As a result she lost her job as a personal care worker.

Imagine instead that Phuong’s call to legal aid goes differently. Rather than being told that they can’t help her because her charge won’t result in jail time, they consider Phuong’s application by phone, looking at the whole situation. Legal aid has done recent outcomes-based research. The representative says that because of her immigration status and that English is not her first language, she should go to a community centre in Canora for help from a court support worker. The centre is welcoming, and the support worker listens to what happened. He sends a report to a duty counsel lawyer at the courthouse.

On the day Phoung goes to the courthouse, she meets with the duty counsel lawyer who again reviews what has happened. The lawyer speaks with the crown prosecutor and explains that Phoung had no intention of stealing, but was exhausted after dealing with a sick child all night and simply overlooked the prescriptions. She is employed and always pays her way. When the judge appears, the lawyers jointly recommend to the judge that the charges be withdrawn, and the judge agrees.
Remember Monique?

The 66 year old accounting clerk who didn’t return to the lawyer’s office after the first consultation? She slipped into a depression and her debt mounted and bills went unpaid. The bank started foreclosure proceedings.

Imagine instead that Monique’s first consultation with the lawyer went differently. Monique’s lawyer had attended a CBA legal education course many years ago and had been inspired to offer legal health checkups to his clients. He was also an avid reader of the many access to justice research papers generated by governments and law schools. After hearing Monique’s story, the lawyer realized that more was going on than simply legal issues. He suggested that Monique take advantage of the “legal health check” program offered by paralegals in his office, and talk to one of the social worker members of the team. As a result of the meeting with the social worker, Monique was referred for counseling. The paralegal uncovered further details and did some research on Monique’s legal health. She advised Monique and the lawyer that the title to the home was vulnerable, and that Monique needed credit counseling. With the support of the social worker, Monique spoke to a credit counselor who helped consolidate her debt, and she stopped using her credit cards. She retained the lawyer to draft a separation agreement and her legal affairs were in order in a few months. Monique’s children paid the lawyer, and she repays them a bit each month. She also manages to put a bit of money away each month.
Remember Anna?

Anna came from Mexico to Ottawa with her daughters seeking asylum as she was fleeing a violent husband. She lost her bid for asylum due to the late delivery of necessary documents from Mexico and lack of legal aid funding for an appeal.

Imagine instead that the Canadian Centre for Justice Innovation has recently completed a comprehensive review of policies and priorities, and through its evidence based research activities, has identified barriers for refugees seeking justice and the legal needs they generally experience as “essential”. The lawyer refers Anna to a community centre that assists refugees in various ways, including with their legal proceedings.

The centre’s staff writes to the local police force in Mexico explaining the urgency of the situation, and asking for help. They make several follow up requests by phone but are unable to secure the paperwork in time for the hearing. They then provide Anna bus fare to go to the hearing in Montreal.

After Anna’s claim for refugee status is refused, she applies for more legal aid for the appeal. Due to increased federal government funding for legal aid for immigration matters, the plan has reinstated funding for lawyers to write an opinion about the merits of the case to legal aid. The lawyer’s opinion letter is successful and Anna gets a lawyer for the judicial review and stay of proceedings. Anna’s appeal is granted and she and her children are allowed to remain in Canada.
Remember Jill?

She was refused legal aid and had to borrow a lot of money to have representation when the judge refused to allow her to represent herself. Her ex-husband was suing her for custody as their three daughters refused to see him. Jill had an unsatisfactory child support award as she could not prove her ex-husband’s cash income.

Imagine instead that Jill qualifies financially for legal aid and does not have to borrow a lot of money. She then spends some of her own money on a private investigator who is able to confirm that Jill’s ex-husband makes additional income that he has not reported on his tax return.

Jill’s province has been recording their access to justice metrics and realizes that the wait for court appearances in Fredericton is much longer than in other parts of the province. Resources are provided to decrease the delays.

At the first court appearance, the Judge refers the custody issue to mediation. In mediation, Jill and her husband can discuss the issues surrounding the breakdown in the relationship between father and daughters. They are referred to an external agency for counseling and resolve the custody issue provided the counseling occurs.

The support issue went forward in court. Jill got an order for arrears of support and for increased child support going forward that reflected her ex’s actual income. The judge told her ex that there were methods of enforcing child support orders that could be used in future if necessary. Jill never had to return to court.

Jill was pleased with the outcome for her children on the custody issue. She volunteered as a subject in the local law school’s access to justice research centre. In doing so, she gave the researchers her perspective on the options available to working poor parents dealing with custody and support issues.
Remember Glynnis?

She trafficked in marijuana to make ends meet for herself and her daughter. She pled guilty to possession of marijuana for purposes of trafficking and went to jail, and her daughter went into a group home hundreds of kilometres away from her.

Imagine instead that the NWT government is part of a collaborative FPT initiative considering how to provide better legal services for citizens in smaller towns underserviced by lawyers. The First Nations of NWT have engaged in community roundtables with the territorial government on options for aboriginal people charged with drug offences. Through both initiatives, research tools and funding have been provided to a local law office. Glynnis’ lawyer was able to present detailed “Gladue” arguments at sentencing, stressing Glynnis’ background and the obstacles she had overcome, and her success as a parent in spite of her own upbringing. Court services were sufficiently resourced to arrange a referral for treatment through her band, and helped Glynnis find suitable care for Destiny while she got treatment. The two were reunited a few months later, and Glynnis was able to find employment, while supported by ongoing narcotics counseling.
Remember Eugene?

He is schizophrenic and waiting to be evicted from his apartment. No one can help him.

Imagine instead that BC has an access to justice commissioner who has been reviewing the Access to Justice metrics report released last year. He is concerned about the lack of access to legal services for citizens with mental health issues. The commissioner has engaged the health sector and the justice sector to create collaborative services. Now when Eugene calls his income assistance worker, she tells him about a new community help centre in his town, staffed by a social worker, nurse and paralegal. The paralegal helps Eugene negotiate an arrangement to repay the landlord what he owes over the next three months. The social worker helps him to manage his money better, and use the food bank regularly until he’s out of trouble. The nurse helps with his medication, and together the nurse and social worker realize that Eugene isn’t taking advantage of subsidies available for medication. With the additional support that he now receives, Eugene is more secure financially, and doesn’t worry about money all the time.
Remember Dave?

Dave couldn’t afford legal services related to custody matters and a no-contact order placed on him by his spouse. As a result, he does not have dependable access to his young children and he is aware that his wife has a substance abuse problem.

Imagine instead that Dave called a number he saw at the bus shelter, for a clinic run by law students. The student said that with the help of his supervising lawyer, they would represent him on the no-contact order. They suggested that Dave contact the courthouse to enroll in a diversion program that included six hours of counseling for each parent in a custody dispute. There was a cost for this, related to your income, but Dave was willing to pay, as he was anxious to get counseling instead of going to court.

After individual counseling, Dave and Mona were seen together. They agreed on a shared custody arrangement with each of them having the children a week at a time.

Dave agreed to pay child support after he accessed a free computer at the local law library where he could look up the Child Support Guidelines. He went back to the student law clinic to have his custody and support terms reviewed before he signed the final agreement.
Remember Arthur?

He was the businessman who represented himself in family court proceedings. He had difficulty navigating the court forms and the clerk’s office would not help him. Exhausted and overwhelmed, he settled with his wife’s lawyer, but had no idea if the deal was fair.

Imagine instead that when Arthur started in business for himself, he took a basic legal information course from the local community college. He also signed up for legal expense insurance, which provided some capped services for family law.

When he was served with his wife’s request for university expenses, he contacted the insurance company. The lawyer provided by the insurance plan said she would prepare all the paperwork for his defence, and after that, he could represent himself or he could retain a private lawyer on a limited scope retainer.

Arthur then researched the legal issues online. He had an elementary idea of the issues, but knew he needed more assistance. He called a family law firm and asked for help on a limited scope retainer. He met with a family law lawyer who simplified the legal concepts for him and advised him of the appropriate range of support that he should pay based on the facts. With this knowledge, Arthur went to court alone. His ex wife’s lawyer arrived and spoke to him about a possible settlement. Arthur was able to negotiate a more equitable deal than was first proposed.
Project description, acknowledgements and reflections

The CBA’s Access to Justice Committee was created in September 2011. The Committee members were:

- Melina Buckley, Ph.D., Chair
- John Sims, QC, Vice-Chair
- Sheila Cameron, QC
- Amanda Dodge
- Patricia Hebert
- Sarah Lugtig
- Gillian Marriott, QC
- Gaylene Schellenberg, Project Director

Each member came to this work with different personal and professional backgrounds and perspectives. Rather than being a hurdle, these differences have enriched our discussions, and our efforts to tackle the wicked problem of reaching equal justice.

The Committee would like to acknowledge the help and encouragement it has received throughout the Equal Justice Initiative. The Committee is deeply indebted to Gaylene Schellenberg for her hard work and dedication to this initiative. She had the difficult job of turning our ambitious goals into the reality and her invaluable assistance did in fact make this vision possible.

In launching the Equal Justice Initiative, the Committee took note of the significant efforts and resources currently devoted to improving access to justice, from so many different and influential factions of the legal profession and justice system.

Given the scope of these efforts, more substantial progress on the issue nationally could be expected at this point, but instead they seem plagued by a lack of coordination, strategic framework or common vision. The willingness to embrace change without leadership or coordination of the various efforts has sometimes resulted in moving ahead on promising ideas, without always considering fully the ramifications and the underlying tough questions that they might suggest.

The Committee first identified four major barriers in the way of substantive progress:

- shortfalls in information;
- lack of political will and public awareness of the issues;
- insufficient coordination and collaboration; and
- absence of tools to measure progress or define what we mean by equal justice.

The Committee then developed three main strategies to address what we perceived as those main barriers to progress.

- First, we planned a consultation and research strategy, to create the knowledge foundation for our initiative.
- Second, we planned to use what we found in the first strategy to change the conversion about equal justice – to ask the hard questions and pull people out of acting in silos toward a more common goal.
- Finally, we would find ways to build ongoing collaboration and coordination, to enable those who are committed to equal justice to work together more effectively and productively.

The Committee began by informing the legal profession and justice system participants describing the initiative. Judges, government officials and politicians, law societies and law foundations, legal aid leaders and many more offered help and support. They provided ongoing feedback as work progressed. The Committee also consulted with justice system participants through conferences, and meetings of CBA Council. This engagement from all justice sectors bodes well for achieving an ambitious but possible innovation agenda.

217 The CBA Equal Justice initiative has occurred in two phases. The first phase, called Envisioning Equal Justice, involved research and consultations to develop a common vision of equal justice, one that includes the perspective of people living in marginalized conditions. The second phase is called Reaching Equal Justice, where a strategic framework for action to lead to that vision was developed.
Different forms of consultation were used for other specific purposes. To inform thinking about how to define ‘access to justice’, and what ‘equal justice’ means for the people who need justice services, community consultations took place in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Québec, Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with different communities living in marginalized conditions. Local lawyers and community partners were instrumental in helping to organize and facilitate these consultations, and linking the Committee to community members who attended and shared their often painful experiences.

The Committee is grateful for the many individuals and organizations who arranged and participated in these community consultations including:

In addition to the Community Consultations, Pro Bono Students’ Canada identified a group of committed law students, and they conducted video interviews with people ‘on the street’ from across Canada. We combined this footage with more offered by the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice. Town hall consultations have been held in recent years in British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario, and the results were also used by the Committee. Legal aid lawyers, community legal workers, and paralegals were surveyed for their views on current issues, and legal aid plans were very helpful in this effort, both in commenting on the survey and in ensuring its broad dissemination.

Five research and discussion papers were prepared and circulated broadly to justice system participants for comment. Each paper addresses a “building block” of reform, an area that the Committee identified as requiring further exploration and debate:

- access to justice metrics;
- national standards for legal aid;
- legal aid service delivery innovations;
- the tension between pro bono and legal aid and
- underexplored options for ensuring access to justice for the middle class.

(see: www.cba.org/cba/equaljustice/about/project.aspx)

Throughout the preparation of the discussion papers and the consultations, several law students, social science students and young lawyers helped by developing background reports or conducting interviews. The Committee acknowledges these contributions by Shahdin Farsai, Elena Haba, Stefanie Carsley, Mieka Buckley-Pearson and David Parry (research and writing) and Alexis Chernish, Christina...
Kwok, Elina Nakhimova, Faiza Hassan, Irene Fatehi, Theresa Kennedy, Lindsey Cybulskie, Chris Clarke, Marie-Christine Gariépy-Assal, Samantha Clarke, and Will Goldbloom (interviewers). We received useful feedback on the discussion papers both through written comments and at workshops at the National Pro Bono Conference in Montreal in November 2012 and the Summit.

These various strategies came together at the Envisioning Equal Justice Summit in Vancouver on April 25-27, 2013. The event brought together about 250 lawyers, community advocates, judges, paralegals, law foundation and law societies, and members of the public. As we hoped, it marked a turning point to start a different more productive and coordinated conversation about access to justice, where justice system participants work together to solve the challenge of equal justice.

The Summit asked participants to leave their “day jobs” at the door, and tackle the big challenges in a new, more collaborative and collegial way. At the closing plenary, all participants worked in small groups to offer their best advice for going forward. The Summit was the focal point of the Committee’s strategy to change the conversation about access to justice.

The Summit would not have been possible without the generous contributions of more than 90 plenary and workshop speakers, including international guests from Australia, the Hague and the US, and the Summit sponsors: Law Foundation of British Columbia; Law Foundation of British Columbia/Legal Services Society Research Fund; DAS Canada; CBA BC; Alberta Justice; Law Society of British Columbia; Law Society of Upper Canada; and Actus Law Droit. Special thanks are due to Heather Block and Hillary Gair, and a raft of volunteers for facilitating the opening night poverty simulation, and to the Board of the United Way of Winnipeg for supporting this initiative.

We would like to express our gratitude to all Summit participants who came together to have a different, renewed conversation about equal justice at this unorthodox event. From the simulation on the opening night, where those present were asked to “live” a simulated month in poverty (in an hour), requiring them to provide for their families and negotiate a maze of social services with limited resources, through to the closing plenary, people engaged. Here are some comments following the event:

“I was blown away by the level of engagement and the ‘buzz’ of meaningful conversations in every corner of the meeting, eating and even washroom spaces! You attracted people from so many different jurisdictions, with such interesting perspectives and openness to hearing others. It was an injection of much-needed energy into the ongoing fight for equal access to justice, and I know it will have an ongoing impact for years to come.” Caroline

“Congratulations on bringing it all together. It has momentum, optimism, ideas for action, engagement - everything you need to carry on with renewed hope.” Vicki “Right from the opening simulation through the few days until the dinner last night I thought it was a wonderful event. It was very motivating to see such a proportion of the profession (and those associated with it) devoting so much time and effort to trying to achieve what you are trying to.” Geoff

“I don’t think I’ve ever been in a place and surrounded by so many people where I felt like everyone was thinking on the same page, open to ideas, and willing to work together.” Danielle

The final strategy is to consider how to encourage greater collaboration and coordination of efforts moving forward. In addition to integrating a collaborative approach throughout its work, the Committee has participated in three ongoing national projects: as a member of the National Action Committee on Access to Justice in Civil and Family Matters as well its Steering Committee and several working groups; the Canadian Forum on Civil Justice Costs of Justice Project; and Professor Julie Macfarlane’s National Study of Self-Represented Litigants.

In preparing this report, the Committee again reached out to the broader justice community for assistance. We asked ten external reviewers to read a draft of this report and again were immensely rewarded by the encouragement and support offered by these busy individuals. We thank Dr. Ab Currie, Justice Thomas Cromwell, Professor Doug Ferguson, Allan Fineblit Q.C., Karen Hudson Q.C., Sharon Matthews Q.C., Professor Mary Jane Mossman, Danielle Rondeau, Allan Seckel, Q.C. and Erin Shaw. Their comments were instrumental in assisting us to clarify and fully develop this strategic framework.

The Committee is also grateful for the editorial assistance provided by Tamra L. Thomson, and administrative and technical support, particularly from Lorraine Prezeau and Denise Poulin, all at the CBA National Office. Finally, the Committee wants to acknowledge, with appreciation, the financial support it has received throughout the Equal Justice Initiative from the CBA and the Law for the Future Fund.

Going forward, the Committee will continue with its main strategies of working with others to build the knowledge base as a foundation for effective change, changing the conversation by engaging more directly with the public about their justice system, and seeking ways to support collaborations at the national and local levels. This report calls for the CBA to be an access to justice leader and we are preparing an action plan to make this goal a reality.

The Committee has styled this report as an invitation to envision and act and it is therefore fitting to end it with personal reflections on how this initiative has changed our perspectives and commitment to “think systemically, act locally”.

Changing the conversation: this emerged as our overarching theme at our very first Committee meeting. Our two-year journey of reflection, hard work and reaching out to the justice community has me more convinced than ever about the absolute need for novel and creative approaches to generating dialogue, enlarging conversations and finding ways to build bridges between conversations and connecting thoughtful communication to thoughtful action to achieve equal justice. What I treasure most about the Summit was the way that we, all of the participants, created an energized space where the commitment to equality and positive change reverberated in intimate conversations between participants, around the tables, and in the larger workshop and plenary groups, in formal sessions and in the nooks and crannies in between. I came away thinking – what steps can we take to facilitate this conversation on a larger, more inclusive scale? I am committed to thinking systemically about a national conversation on reaching equal justice and to facilitating local dialogue within it. I am hopeful that this report is a first step, but mindful of the reality that reports don’t make change, people make change.

Melina Buckley
In 2013, the New Brunswick family court system had become increasingly mired in delays, leaving us with a system where a date for a first appearance for custody, child support and spousal support could take 7-8 months. As I watched the system fail to respond to the needs of its clients, my faith in the process diminished.

After the Summit, I returned to New Brunswick with a renewed hope for real change. The feeling from the 200+ people in the room at the closing of the summit was overwhelming; there was a palpable desire for a paradigm shift in the way we resolve legal problems in Canada. But I was still left with the ‘what now?’ question & how do I help my clients right now, while the bigger change issues get worked on for the next number of years.

I recalled the “think systemically, act locally” mantra from the summit. I then set in motion a series of meetings that ultimately resulted in a local pilot project for September 2013 so simplified motions for custody, child support and spousal support will be heard within 6-8 weeks of filing. The project has been announced to the local bar and we are waiting with anticipation for its commencement.

Sheila Cameron

Sometimes the amount of work to be done to effect change seems overwhelming. After the Summit, though, it felt as if we were all speaking with one voice and that much more seemed possible. The change, for me, was keeping my eyes open for every opportunity to improve access and seeing how every community member was a potential agent of change. At a recent meeting with Queens’ Bench Justices on another issue, we discussed our court’s triage project and found we could open discussions that could better coordinate these developments with other parties in the process. At a charity lunch, an executive of a large local business was telling me about an initiative they were doing to promote services for mental health. After a short discussion, we found that I could introduce them to partners so they could expand their project to assist in accessing justice for more members of the community with mental health issues. The opportunities are there, the partners are there and they are willing. It may take only a few moments and some knowledge (thinking systemically!) to create more champions in our local communities.

Patricia Hebert
I came away from the Summit - and from our work on this Report - thinking about partnerships. I am convinced we can work together to achieve equal access once we have a common vision of where we want to go and how we can get there. Just last week, our Law Society’s CEO had a great suggestion for a public-private partnership to deal with the family law cases our student legal clinic must turn away due to conflict of interest. The clinic is now exploring this option. If we continue to think creatively about potential partnerships and opportunities for mutual support, within a common vision, there is so much we can do.

Sarah Lugtig

My, “take away” both from the committee’s work and the Summit echoes Sarah’s to a certain extent in that I agree that it is through partnerships and collaborative efforts that we will be able to move forward to addressing the access to justice issues that we face. However, as someone involved in the “local” action, I also was reminded that it is crucial that we look to the bigger picture and that we encourage and reinforce the necessity of the “system” changing to address the changing needs and requirements of our society. The Summit was a crucial piece to this as it brought together individuals who I don’t believe had ever put it together that they “all” need to be at the table. The energy and enthusiasm of the Summit moved people in a way I don’t think they expected and that was very exciting and encouraging. I came away from the Summit thinking that we could “actually” achieve our goals and that we could positively impact the access issues. It was inspiring and to see that it has already led others to look at opportunities demonstrates that we can move forward and effect change. Thank you to all of you for including me on this journey!

Gillian Marriott
The main thing that I will take with me from our committee’s work and the dialogue at the Summit is the primacy of inclusivity. It’s absurd, really, to think that we could develop and run an effective system without consulting the system’s users. More than just enhancing our effectiveness, listening and responding to the voices of the people we are attempting to serve is about authentic relationship building. As our Elder taught us, maintaining power imbalances through one-way service provision is unsustainable; there must be recalibration to incorporate reciprocity. I think this is an important, redemptive message for all of us in the justice system; I hope our Committee’s report stimulates thinking and action toward inclusivity.

In terms of “acting locally“, CLASSIC has made a commitment to host community conversations each year, multiple times throughout the year if possible, to hear the community’s voices: identifying their priorities for justice initiatives and their recommendations to improve our service delivery. In my Masters studies this fall, I will be focussing on authentic partnership with marginalized communities toward meeting their social justice goals.

Amanda Dodge

I feel I left the Summit with new eyes. The optimism and renewed energy of those at that conference helped me see that change actually is possible. We don’t have to accept – we shouldn’t accept – the barriers that for too long have denied effective justice to so many people. I am more confident than ever that, together, we can make real progress in improving access to justice.

John Sims

This Committee may have arrived at our first meeting expecting that this would be ‘just another project’, ‘another report’, but I think we soon shared a feeling that we had a special opportunity - to imagine how our civil justice system in Canada might work to be truly available to everyone. I’ve come to recognize the importance of taking the time to develop that vision, and a solid plan for achieving it, so people have a sense that their work is contributing in a coordinated way toward a common goal. The Summit was a major test – could we encourage others, many worn down from years of trying, to join us in this optimistic exercise? It worked, people came and joined in the spirit of the event – it was amazing and energizing. Whether our suggestions here are right or wrong, more likely partially right, partially not, I hope they will be received as a sincere attempt to offer our ideas on how we can move forward differently to see real progress toward equal justice.

Community Engagement Framework: Practical guidance for initiating dialogue with community members about the justice system.

This framework was developed by representatives of the Committee through a collaborative process in Saskatoon in 2012. It was pilot tested in several sites and then employed in 13 consultation sessions held in 2012 and early 2013.

Ethical Framework

We recommend implementing the following ethical principles in community engagement:

- Honour the values of inclusion and collaboration, affirming the diversity of the community

  - Design and execute the community engagement by involving community members themselves. Ensure that the conversation is framed by them.
- Honour the values of reciprocity and empowerment
  - Recognize and compensate participants for their time and contributions in genuine and meaningful ways.
  - Look for ways to empower and equip the participants and their communities through this process.

- Honour the value of humility
  - Acknowledge that the participants have knowledge and a voice.
  - We are seeking to hear it because it has value.

- Honour the value of equity
  - Maintain an awareness of, and take steps to avoid as much as possible the imbalances of power between facilitators and participants.

- Respect the dignity, rights and interests of the participants
  - Ensure free, informed and ongoing consent of participants.
  - Be non-judgmental, accepting and respectful of the participants.

Practical Steps
A first step will involve partnering with community-based organizations, such as food banks or open door societies. Look for organizations that are trusted by, and provide a safe space for community members.

Generally, engagement will simply involve conversations with community members. One-on-one conversations are possible, but group discussions are likely more effective and efficient.

Community discussions should not be solely facilitated by a member of the established legal community (e.g. lawyer, judge, government representative), as that may inhibit or prevent candid responses from the participants. To elicit the most authentic feedback from community members, the discussions should be facilitated by, or at least co-facilitated by, a community representative. Ideally, the community representative will be someone whose identity and experience reflects that of the group being engaged. Alternatively, the community representative will be someone who works closely with the community and is known and trusted by the community members. This could be someone who works at the community-based organization being partnered with, and/or is a respected leader in the community.

To promote participation, it is best if the discussions are informal, round-table style, and the groups are relatively small (10-12 members maximum). Larger, town-hall meetings can also elicit authentic feedback, however with a large group many attendees will be too shy to participate.

Prior to the discussions, consult with community leaders about cultural norms and attitudes within the group, and any relevant protocol and spiritual practices followed by the group.

At the outset of the discussions, informed consent will need to be obtained, ideally in writing with a plain language form. The informed consent should include:

- A statement as to:
  - the purpose of the discussion
  - who is conducting the discussion
  - its expected duration
  - the nature of anticipated participation
  - how the participants’ feedback will be used

- A comment as to any mutually beneficial goals, including and in particular:
  - how it may help participants and their communities
  - how it may enhance the capacity of the participants’ communities
  - how it may address long-term community needs
• Assurance of anonymity:
• Assurance of participants’ ability to withdraw from the consultation at any time without prejudice to their entitlements

It is best to read and explain the provisions of the informed consent form orally, so to address any literacy challenges. At the time consent is considered, the co-facilitators should speak to how these consultations may benefit the community members and how they can access data recorded from the discussion.

During the discussion, the facilitators should focus on listening, not talking. They should be mindful of the group’s protocol and practices, and be alive to ongoing dynamics in the group. Feedback may be captured through note-taking or recording the session. Ensure that the participants are aware of, and consent to how their feedback is being captured, and whether their identity will be anonymous.

There are practical ways to incorporate the principle of reciprocity. It is important to provide refreshments for participants during the discussion, as well as providing honoraria of some kind (e.g. cash, gift card) to the participants, to reflect the value of the time and feedback they are providing.

Thanks and acknowledgements

This study has been generously funded by the Law Foundation of Alberta, the Law Foundation of British Columbia (the Legal Services Society of British Columbia) and the Law Foundation of Ontario. Thanks especially to Deborah Duncan, Kirsten Manley and Wayne Robertson for their support and assistance. While financially supported by the three Law Foundations, the findings of this research do not necessarily reflect the views of the Foundations.

Special thanks are owed to the Project Advisory Board – Professor John Manwaring (Chair), Justice John Rooke, Mary Anne Docherty, Mary Butterfield, Melina Buckley, Dr Noel Semple and Sherry MacLennan – as well as John Greacen, Perry Dunmore, Gillian Dunmore and Bernie Mayer, for their thoughtful input to the draft report and recommendations.

I appreciated the time and expertise provided by the justice ministries in the three participating provinces who worked with me to identify the study field sites (Anne-Marie Predko and Maretta Miranda in Ontario, Edie Delanghe in Alberta, and Irene Robertson and Lisa Nakamura in British Columbia.)

To the more than one hundred court staff and service providers who sat down to be interviewed for this study, and the 259 self-represented litigants who participated in interviews and/or focus groups interviews – I sincerely hope that I have been able to accurately capture your perspectives here.

I am extremely grateful to my Project team – Raman Pandher, Lois Li, Kyla Fair and Cynthia Eagan – for all their hard work and dedication to this undertaking. Thuy Bin-Shiu dealt with many aspects of the Project finances, and fielded innumerable calls from people looking for “that Ontario professor doing the study.” Finally, Sue Rice, the Project Co-ordinator, has been absolutely pivotal in creating the conditions for this research and providing organizational and creative support throughout. This really was a team effort - thank you all.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Part 1: The study

1. Methodology

The goal of this qualitative study was to develop data on the experience of self-represented litigants in three Canadian provinces: Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. Field sites in each province were used as primary data collection points, but SRL respondents also came via social media and from all over each province. In addition, service providers (court staff, duty counsel, pro bono lawyers, staff in community agencies working with SRL’s) were included in the sample. Most respondents (almost 90% of SRL’s and 100% of service providers) participated in an in-depth personal interview; the remaining 10% of SRL’s participated in a focus group.

2. Data sample

259 SRL’s from the three provinces participated in either an in-depth personal interview or a focus group. Including follow-up interviews, a total of 283 interviews were conducted with SRL’s. In addition 107 interviews were conducted with service providers (defined above).

3. SRL demographics

The characteristics of the SRL sample are broadly representative of the general Canadian population. 50% were men and 50% were women. 50% had a university degree. 57% reported income of less than $50,000 a year and 40% (the largest single group) reported incomes of less than $30,000 a year.

60% of the SRL were family litigants and 31% were litigants in civil court (13% in small claims and 18% in general civil). 4% were appearing in tribunals (the remainder were unassigned). The majority of family SRL’s were filed in the divorce court (Supreme Court, Queen’s Bench or Superior Court) and a smaller number in provincial family court.

Part 2: Decisions over self-representation

4. Motivations

By far the most consistently cited reason for self-representation was the inability to afford to retain, or to continue to retain, legal counsel. In addition, some SRL respondents were dissatisfied with the legal services that they had received earlier in this case when they were represented by counsel. Their complaints (in their own words) included: counsel “doing nothing”; counsel not interested in settling the case; difficulty finding counsel to take their case; counsel not listening or explaining; counsel made mistakes/ was not competent.

53% of the sample had been represented by counsel earlier in their action. Three quarters of these had retained a private lawyer, and the remainder had been legally aided, but this was now discontinued. These respondents had exhausted their available resources and were often resentful that despite significant expenditures on private legal services, they were still not at the end of their action. Past experience with legal counsel in an earlier case or legal transaction was not dispositive in their decision to self-represent.

Around one in five SRL respondents expressed a personal determination to take their matter forward themselves, as well as acknowledging financial reasons to self-represent. A small number – around than 10% of the sample - expressed confidence from the outset that they could handle their case themselves and saw retaining legal counsel as a poor use of resources when relatively little money was at stake.

5. The expectations / experience disconnect

Some SRL’s began with a reasonable sense of confidence; others began with trepidation. However within a short time almost all the SRL respondents became disillusioned, frustrated, and in some cases overwhelmed by the complexity of their case and the amount of time it was consuming.

Part 3: How SRL’s engage with the justice system

6. SRL’s and court forms

While on-line court forms appear to offer the prospect of enhanced access to justice, many forms are complex and difficult to complete, and SRL’s often find they have made mistakes and omissions. The most common complaints include difficulty knowing which form(s) to use; apparently inconsistent information from court staff/judges; difficulty with the language used on forms; and the consequences of mistakes including adjournments and more wasted time and stress. These widespread difficulties result in frustration for SRL’s and additional burdens on court personnel, including registry staff and judges.

There has been some progress made towards developing user-friendly and simplified court forms, but it is far too little. A number of court staff commented that they (and some lawyers) also had difficulty completing complex and lengthy court forms and keeping up with constant changes. In her assignment to apply for a divorce in the three provinces (The Divorce Applications Project), Kyla Fair also found that even with legal training, the forms were confusing, contained terminology she did not understand, and required an enormous amount of work and concentration.

Court guides are an important step towards assisting SRL’s complete forms and understand court procedure but these too are often written in a confusing and complex manner. In her “audit” of three sample Court Guides, Cynthia Eagan found problems very similar to those highlighted above by SRL’s regarding court forms (see (7) below).

7. On-line resources for SRL’s

A large amount of the assistance presently made available to SRL’s by the courts (and some service providers) is in the form of on-line information and related technologies (on-line forms, informational websites, and some video material). New initiatives in programming and support for SRL’s in both Canada and the United States are largely based on the premise that access to the Internet can promote access to justice for SRL’s. While many of these initiatives are in relatively early stages of development, this study suggests there are significant limitations and deficiencies to this material. On-line resources often require some level of understanding and knowledge in order to be able to make best use of them.

SRL’s who anticipated that the proliferation of on-line resources would enable them to represent themselves successfully became disillusioned and disappointed once they began to try to work with what is presently available on-line. In particular, they identified the following weaknesses: an emphasis on substantive legal information and an absence of information on practical tasks like filing or serving, advice on negotiation or a strategy for talking to the other side, presentation techniques, or even legal procedure; often directed them to other sites (sometimes with broken links) with inconsistent information; and multiplicity of sites with no means of differentiating which is the most “legitimate”. Cynthia Eagan found many of the same problems when she audited a selection of on-line Court Guides (The Court Guides Assessment project). Cynthia also highlighted the reading levels of some of this material (as high as 13.5), and the heavy use of jargon and unexplained legal terms.

The study data also shows that no matter how complete, comprehensive and user-friendly (standards we are still far from meeting), on-line resources are insufficient to meet SRL needs for face-to-face orientation, education and other support. Enhanced on-line technologies can be an important component of SRL programming – for example the development of sites developed specifically for SRL’s making use of interactive technology - but cannot provide a complete service.

8. Legal information for SRL’s

It is clear that many SRL’s are eager to access further and better sources of legal information. SRL’s in the study frequently described themselves as seeking “guidance” rather than “direction”. This suggests that the expansion of legal information services (along with the clarification of the legal information/ legal advice distinction, below) has the potential to relieve pressure on more costly public legal services such as duty counsel.

The most common source of legal information for SRL’s are court staff, primarily those working at the registry counters but also staff working in court programs such as Pro Bono Ontario, FLIC & LinC in Alberta, and the Justice Access Centres in British Columbia. These excellent services are not always clearly “signposted” in the courthouse or on the courthouse website; as a consequence some SRL’s appeared to have missed the opportunity to use these programs (this was also a problem for mediation services; see below at (9)). SRL’s consistently described staff working in these locations as the “most helpful” person they encountered during their SRL experience. However they also complained about the restrictions on the time and scope of information that these staff can offer, because of the limitation on their providing “legal advice” (which results in substantial personal discretion, which some SRL’s are better at exploiting than others) or because of the sheer volume of people they are dealing with.

The distinction between legal information/ legal advice which lies at the heart of the job descriptions of staff working on the court counters and in information services is consistently complained about by both SRL’s and staff, as at best unclear and at worst practically unworkable. The present situation places an unfair burden on court staff who are required to make constant determinations of how much information they can provide to frustrated SRL’s. This leads to inconsistent applications and creates a barrier between SRL’s and certain basic information that may be construed as “legal advice”.

Court and agency staff providing legal information to SRL’s described an almost identical set of frustrations and challenges to SRL respondents. They also accurately identified the primary frustrations and challenges of the SRL’s. Court and agency staff are working under enormous pressure in dealing with the growing SRL population and constantly changing court forms and procedures. These are very stressful jobs, for which they are often poorly trained and remunerated.

9. Other support & resources for SRL’s

Service providers universally recognized the frustrations of SRL’s as a source of pressure on the justice system in general, and on court staff and judicial officers in particular. Improving the experience for SRL’s by developing low cost support services for them has the potential to both improve the efficiency and enhance the morale of the entire justice system. SRL’s talked about a variety of “non-legal” services that they needed but either were not currently available to them, or did not meet their needs.

SRL’s particularly identified the need for orientation and education (aside from legal training) to enable them to better anticipate and plan for what is involved in self-representation. While this study did not evaluate the effectiveness of existing mandatory education programs (eg Parenting After Separation, MIPS), it is clear that many SRL’s are looking for different forms of educational workshops to prepare them for the SRL experience. In particular, they are asking for practical tools and skills that they can apply in practice.

SRL’s also described a need for one-on-one assistance in the form of “coaching” (eg document review, answering questions) which support them in handling their own case but also provide checks, as well as moral support. For many SRL’s who wish to remain in control of their own case, coaching would be an important resource.
A significant number of SRL’s say that they were never offered mediation, and/or do not know what it is. This is a clear gap that needs to be urgently addressed (for example in educational workshops and better publicity). Some SRL’s were nervous about participating in mediation, and especially where there was a lawyer representing the other side. Some SRL’s who were eager to resolve their case expressed frustration that the Bench did not exercise greater pressure on a recalcitrant opposing side to come to mediation.

At present many SRL’s bring friends and/or family members with them to the courthouse for moral support, especially on appearance days. There is a great deal of confusion and inconsistency surrounding the role of friends or supporters of SRL’s, as well as the potential for an unrepresented person to being a McKenzie friend into the courtroom. This lack of clarity and the wide exercise of discretion by some judges is creating resentment and confusion.

Finally, many SRL’s do not have access to the types of office facilities that they require in order to represent themselves, including printing services, photcopying facilities and even computers. Some services are presently provided by counter staff (informally) or overburdened court-based programming.

Part 4: SRL’s, Lawyers and Judges

10. Delivering legal services to SRL’s

This study shows clearly (and consistent with other recent studies) that the primary reason for self-representation is financial. Many SRL’s find that the legal services that they can realistically afford to pay for, and/or prioritize as an area in which they want assistance, are simply not available to them other than in a traditional legal services model. Financial retainers and services billed at a rate of $350-400 an hour are beyond the means of many Canadians. 53% of the SRL sample who were willing to pay for counsel at first later ran out of funds and/or exhausted their willingness to continue to pay for legal services.

86% of the SRL sample sought legal counsel, either in the form of private legal services of legally aided/ pro bono assistance. SRL’s are not saying that they do not want lawyers to help them – but that the way in which lawyers are currently offering their services does not fit within their budget. Some are also saying that they prefer to have more control over the progression of their case and resist the traditional assumption of professional control by their lawyer.

Other complaints made consistently by some SRL’s who had previously been represented in this action included: counsel “doing nothing”, and no progress being made; counsel being disinterested in settlement possibilities and processes (including mediation); counsel not listening to them or consulting them in decision-making; and a sense that their lawyer was insufficiently familiar in the relevant area of law to be effective as counsel. A further complaint was that lawyers were not truly accountable to the public, and that efforts to question their competence were often not taken seriously by the courts or the regulators.

When asked in interviews what they would ask a lawyer to do for them now, assuming that they could be provided with an affordable and competent counsel, some SRL’s said that they were no longer interested in working with a lawyer. This was usually the result of a negative experience with a legal representative earlier in this action, and their determination now to manage their case themselves. Many more SRL’s responded that they would prefer to have legal counsel, if this was affordable, offered them tangible value-for-money as they understood this (ie expertise they lacked and the prospect of a better outcome), and would allow them to remain in control of major decisions about the direction and conclusion of their case.

While many SRL’s appreciated the assistance they received from duty counsel or other pro bono legal services, the study also found dissatisfaction with the most common model of delivery ie the summary legal advice model. While this model works well for some SRL’s, others find a time limited opportunity to speak with legal counsel leaves them more confused, and even panicked, than before. At the same time, court duty counsel models are in serious overload. For both reasons, there is a need for reassessment of how to offer the maximum value to the maximum number of SRL’s via the summary advice model.

Respondents frequently questioned the limitations placed on the provision of assistance by para-legals, especially in relation to family matters.

Finally, many SRL’s sought some type of “unbundled” legal services from legal counsel; for example, assistance with document review, writing a letter, or appearing in court. Relatively few were successful in accessing legal services on this basis despite a sustained effort. This was perplexing to many respondents, who could not afford to pay a traditional retainer and envisaged that they could undertake some parts of the necessary work themselves, with assistance.

11. Court appearances and interactions with judges

The influx of SRL’s into the family and civil courts has dramatically altered the judicial role. Judges, especially in family court, now find themselves dealing with SRL’s as often as with lawyers representing clients. This is a huge sea change that some members of the judiciary are clearly adjusting to better than others. The study data is replete with SRL descriptions of negative experiences with judges, some of which suggest basic incivility and rudeness. There are also some examples of judicial interventions such as providing advice regarding court procedure, coaching on presentation, and progress towards settlement, which attract positive comments from SRL’s. Other studies show that judges are concerned about showing “favour” towards SRL’s and find themselves in a difficult position when one side is represented by counsel, and the other is not.

Most SRL’s saw numerous judges during the progress of their case, and many complained that this created inconsistencies and required them to re-establish their credibility at each appearance. Very few SRL’s experienced single judge case management but those who did were far more satisfied with their overall experience.

There was a very widespread sentiment among SRL’s that judges are not truly accountable and that the current mechanism for bringing forward a complaint against a judge is highly protective of the judiciary.

12. Social impact and consequences

The study data illustrates a range of negative consequences experienced by SRL’s as a result of representing themselves. These include depletion of personal funds and savings for other purposes; instability or loss of employment caused by the amount of time required to manage their legal case; social and emotional isolation from friends and family as the case becomes increasingly complex and overwhelming; and a myriad of health issues both physical and emotionally.

The scale and frequency of these individually experienced consequences represent a social problem on a scale that requires our recognition and attention. The costs are as yet unknown.

Preliminary Recommendations based on these findings are included at the end of this Report.
Part One: The Study and the Sample

1. Study Methodology

   a. Background

   There have been dramatic increases in the numbers of people representing (self-represented litigants or SRL’s) themselves in family and civil court over the past decade, across North America. In some family courts this number now reaches to 80% and is consistently 60-65% at the time of filing.¹

   The impetus for this study came from these startling statistics. It also came from two other realizations following review of the existing literature and research on SRL’s in North America and elsewhere. The first was that the majority of this literature documented the perspectives and views of judges and lawyers (ie system insiders and experts). Judges and lawyers were not included in this study not because their perspectives are not important and valuable, but because they have already been the subject of several other major studies². In contrast, the perspective of SRL’s themselves and their actual experiences is mostly absent from other studies. Those studies that have gathered information about SRL’s are either closed-question surveys (often focusing on demographics) and/or small samples³. As a result, the SRL experience to date has been largely a subject of speculation rather than empirical data.

   A second realization was that policy is being made on the basis of very little empirical information from SRL’s about their needs and challenges in navigating court processes. An initial review of SRL programming revealed that the focus of most new initiatives being developed across North America is to offer SRL’s more on-line resources – forms that can be completed on-line, on-line websites and information. While these initiatives are an important part of responding to the phenomenal growth in the number of SRL’s, it seemed questionable that such a heavy and singular emphasis should be placed on these types of resources, particularly in the absence of SRL input on what services and resources they actually needed and wanted. It seemed to be time to focus our attention on SRL’s themselves, and their own accounts of their experiences, on the basis that “(P)ublic views...are one factor that needs to be considered when thinking about policy change.”⁴

a. A note on terminology

The use of the term “self-represented litigant” or SRL is used throughout this Report and is preferred to “unrepresented” or the more traditional “litigant in person”. The term “unrepresented” suggests a level of intention and choice to appear without a lawyer that mischaracterizes the motives of the vast majority of the respondents in this study. The decision to adopt the term “self-represented” as a generic term throughout this Report reflects the conclusions of the Lord Chancellor's Civil Justice Council Working Group in the United Kingdom which rejected the use of the term “unrepresented”, saying that it assumes that the norm is representation by lawyers. This assumption can no longer be made.

c. Study objectives

The purpose of this study was to enter the world of the SRL’s, and understand the experience of self-representation through their eyes. This meant collecting extremely detailed narratives directly from SRL’s about all aspects of their experience from beginning to end (or, to date).

The study aimed to collect data to answer the following questions from individuals representing themselves in either family or civil court:

i. Why are they representing themselves?
ii. What were their initial expectations and how far are these realized by their experience?
iii. Have they explored alternatives to court?
iv. What resources (on-line, paper, people, other) do they use and how helpful are they?
v. What is their experience of their reception and treatment by judges, lawyers, and court staff?
vi. What course does their progress through the legal process take? (eg filing, service, settlement conferences, mediation, hearings, trial)
vii. What is the (financial, emotional, practical) impact on them of self-representing?
viii. What, in their view, needs to change about the system in order to improve their experience as a SRL?

5 See further detail below at (4)
7 Including but not limited to small claims court, where the upper limit is now $25,000 in all three participating provinces
8 While there are growing numbers of SRL’s in criminal court [see for example “Court Side Study of Adult Unrepresented Accused in the Provincial Criminal Courts” Robert G. Hann, R. Meredith, C. Nuffield J, and Svoboda M. available at http://www.justice.gc.ca/eng/pi/rs/rep-rap/2003/cr03_la2-cr03_ai2/p1.html], the very different narrative of a criminal defendant from a family or civil litigant suggested the importance of excluding this group from the sample. A few criminal SRL’s contacted the Project, but we declined to interview them.
While this study was not designed as a program evaluation of services available to family and civil SRL’s in either the courts or the community, a related objective was to develop a picture of the types of services and support that SRL’s found valuable. To meet this objective, interviews were also conducted with those offering assistance in a variety of capacities and from various skill sets to SRL’s (for example, registry staff, mediators, staff providing legal information, duty counsel, lawyers providing legal advice via community clinics and other programs, para-legals). The study sought out individuals working on the “front lines” of the SRL explosion, such as the staff of services like the Justice Access Centres in British Columbia, the LinC centres in Alberta and the Pro Bono centres in Ontario. These individuals are often not legally trained and qualified and work in fairly low status and poorly remunerated positions.

In this Report these individuals are called “service providers”. While these interviews were a secondary focus (more than two thirds of interviews were conducted with SRL’s) they offer important insights into working “in the trenches” with SRL’s and are integrated into the study findings below.

259 SRL’s from the three provinces participated in the study. This includes individuals who participated in a focus group, as well as those who were interviewed in person and by telephone. 230 SRL’s provided complete demographic data (below).

Most respondents (almost 90% of SRL’s and 100% of service providers) participated in an in-depth personal interview, and the remaining 10% of SRL’s participated in a focus group.

When follow-up interviews are included, a total of 283 interviews were conducted with SRL’s. A further 107 interviews were conducted with service providers (see Appendix A)

d. Research design

i. Selection of the field sites

The first step in research design was the identification of courthouse sites in the three participating provinces. Three sites were selected in each province to reflect a range of prospective respondent demographics, to include at least one rural and one urban site and to capture some racial and ethnic diversity. Justice ministry staff in each province played an active role in identifying potential sites and facilitating introductions to the courthouse managers. The final list of all sites in all provinces is included at Appendix B.

Unfortunately we encountered some difficulties with accessing the selected courthouse sites in Ontario. One of the sites initially selected in consultation with the 9 In Alberta we were asked by the Law Foundation of Alberta to add Lethbridge as an additional field site. In British Columbia, Vancouver effectively functioned as a fourth field site, with the Project material was displayed at the Robson Street courthouse Justice Access Centre.

Ontario MAG was apparently unable to facilitate our access following an initial field site visit and so no SRL focus groups were conducted there (although some court staff interviews were conducted on the first visit). Three other courthouses approached by the ministry were reluctant to display the project information on their counters. Finally we were able to work very successfully with two of the busiest courthouses in Toronto, and held focus groups there in the Fall of 2012.

The courthouse sites were intended to serve as the primary means of developing the sample group (of both SRL’s and service providers) in each province. It was also anticipated that over time, respondents in other locations would hear about the Project and contact us. This is exactly what happened. The Project received considerable media attention in each province and as a result, SRL respondents came forward from towns and cities all over each province.

ii. Establishing the field sites

Once each field site was identified and initial contact established between the Principal Investigator\(^{10}\) and the courthouse manager, Project materials (flyers and posters explaining the Project and giving the Project website and toll-free line for contact) were mailed to the courthouse for display at the registry counters. The managers at each field site were extremely supportive in ensuring that the Project material was prominently displayed, and asking their staff to facilitate access to these materials. A French and a Punjabi version of the Project poster was also printed for display at some field sites on their request.

At each site, contact was also established with local programs and services for SRL’s – from specialized programs such as the local LinC or Family Mediation program, to other social programming that would likely see SRL’s such as the local library, food bank, services for new immigrants, women’s groups and men’s groups. These contacts lead to both increased publicity for the Project (when the agency displayed our material in their facilities) and also introduced us to other service providers.

Following this initial contact, two visits were paid to each field site (with the exception of the later added Ontario sites and the later added Alberta site, where the work described below was compacted into one longer visit).

1. First site visit

On the first visit to each field site, the Principal Investigator (and in some cases the Project Co-ordinator\(^{11}\)) met with the courthouse manager(s) in order to introduce ourselves in person. We described and answered questions about the Project. The managers were then interviewed using the interview template for service providers (Appendix C). This is a semi-structured interview template that focuses on a few key

\(^{10}\) Dr Julie Macfarlane
\(^{11}\) Sue Rice
questions for this group including the pace and impact of change within the SRL population, the impact on their services, and their frustrations and challenges in working with SRL’s.

Following these meetings and interviews with managers, we then (by prior arrangement with the managers) interviewed registry staff, as well as (where possible) service providers located in the courthouse (for example staff at Family Law Information Centres in Alberta, Justice Access Centres in British Columbia, or Pro Bono Ontario in Ontario, as well as with court duty counsel). Where possible on this first visit, we also met with and interviewed service providers outside the courthouse who deal regularly with SRL’s (for example staff at Family Justice Centres in British Columbia, citizens advocacy and advice services, Native Friendship Centres, domestic violence support services etc).

2. Second site visit

Prior to the second visit to each site, we used local media and publicity in the courthouses to advertise SRL focus groups. The focus groups aimed to generate an initial conversation about participants’ experiences as family or civil SRL’s, and to encourage them to participate further in the study via a personal interview.

Up to four focus groups were held on the second field site visit. Focus group discussions were structured around five key questions (Appendix D). Contemporaneous notes were taken. Participants were asked to complete a short sheet of demographics12 and the focus group transcript could then link a speaker to these details for inclusion in the Project database.

All focus group participants were offered the opportunity to complete a more detailed SRL personal interview. Many of the focus groups were small enough for us to conduct these more detailed personal interviews on-the-spot using the full SRL interview template (Appendix E), either one-on-one, or in very small groups where participants were comfortable speaking about their experiences in more detail in front of others.

Further service provider interviews (especially off-site in the local community) were conducted during the second site visit.

iii. Building the sample

We were fortunate to receive a great deal of local media attention in almost every field site and following both the first and second visits, the Project heard from many more SRL’s (as well as some service providers) wishing to participate in the study. Many of these participants came via the Project website, with the remainder via the Project toll-free line (see data collection strategies, below at (e)). The level of interest in participating in the study was very high – some weeks it felt almost overwhelming. We undertook to respond to everyone who contacted us via either the website and the toll-free line and scheduled up 12 The same information captured in interviews from SRL’s – see Appendix E. This captured potentially significant respondent variables including gender, income levels, education, prior experience of legal representation to four telephone interviews (almost all conducted by the Principal Investigator) a day during the busiest periods.

Interviews lasted between 45 minutes and one hour but sometimes ran as long as 90 minutes. 90% of the personal one-on-one interviews were conducted by the Principal Investigator, Dr Macfarlane. The remaining 10% were conducted by Sue Rice, the Project Co-ordinator and Kyla Fair, the Project Research Assistant while Dr Macfarlane was on vacation for three weeks. Both were first trained and supervised by Dr Macfarlane to ensure consistency. Dr Macfarlane (with the assistance of Sue Rice) also conducted almost all the focus groups.

Some respondents whose cases were ongoing were re-contacted six to eight weeks after their initial interview and offered the chance to update their file by email communication or to take part in another personal interview. Both follow-up interviews and email communications were added to their file in the Project database.

iv. Other sampling questions

A decision was made at an early stage not to develop a control group as part of the sample design. In a qualitative study of this kind it is extremely difficult to establish a truly comparative sample (for example holding constant variables such as dispute type, money at stake, individual parties etc).

It is extremely challenging to ensure a “pure” randomized sample, given the reliance on voluntary participation. Instead the research sample was developed via a range of communication strategies including social media. In a qualitative study of this kind, which demands a considerable investment of time by respondents, voluntary opt-in is the only feasible design.

Given this constraint, the way in which the sample was collected supports the assertion that the study sample was effectively randomized as a result of the myriad points of entry. Whereas five years ago we might have used a targeted mail out (eg to named individuals who filed as SRL’s) to ensure a more traditionally solicited sample, the pervasiveness of Internet access in Canada plus the use of widely displayed print materials and the Project toll-free line allowed very widespread access to the study. This was evidenced in the enormous number of enquiries that we received throughout the data collection phase and continue to receive on a daily basis and to date.

13 One additional focus group was conducted by Bernie Mayer and Michael Dwyer in Victoria on September 19th, 2012
14 In 2010 Statistics Canada estimated that 79% of Canadian households had Internet access. These figures are somewhat higher in urban centres than more rural and isolated communities, borne out by our experience in the course of this research. It is also notable that this figure drops to 54% for households with an annual income of less than $30,000 (40% of the SRL sample see below at). See http://www.statcan.gc.ca/daily-quotidien/110525/dq110525b-eng.htm. Further, almost 90% of the SRL sample reported in interviews that they were comfortable using the Internet to conduct research for their case.
e. Further data collection strategies

Flyers and posters describing the Project to SRL’s in family and civil court and soliciting their participation were created and printed (in a different color and listing the field sites for each province). This material made it clear that a SRL in family or civil court from anywhere in the province might also participate. The Project website and toll-free line were provided on the flyers and posters.

A Webmaster (Lois Li) was hired to build and maintain the Project website (www.representing-yourself.org) which was to become a critical element in outreach to SRL’s. 43% of SRL respondents came through the Project website. The site email linked directly to the personal email of the Principal Investigator and the Project Co-ordinator and enabled the Project Co-ordinator to then schedule) interviews.

The website also carried details of the field sites in each province and included a listing of local resources for SRL’s. In this way we could offer some practical assistance to the SRL’s who visited the website as well as solicit their participation in the study. The website has also enabled us to post links to media coverage of the Project.

Initial discussions with court staff in some of the more remote field sites resulted in a realization that the Project also needed to provide a toll-free line for those without Internet access. A toll-free line was set up in March 2012 with a message asking people to leave their details so that we could respond to them. The toll-free line was in place until January 4, 2013, and checked daily for new messages, which were then returned and an interview scheduled. 27% of SRL respondents came via the toll-free line.

In May 2012 we launched a Facebook page (Representing-Yourself-in-a-Legal-Process) in order to build an on-line community for SRL’s and enable us to communicate with and reach out to SRL’s. It was made clear that comments and debate would be captured (and anonymized) for the Project database. The Facebook page now has more than 160 members, and has become very significant in the development of the Project. Every couple of weeks we have posted a “Question of the Week” for discussion - for example, a link to an article about self-representation, or a question about people’s experiences both positive and negative, or a question about future reforms. This has produced a lively dialogue.

Finally, a project blog (www.wordpress/drjuliemacfarlane) was launched in August 2012. This is linked to Twitter and has attracted a number of followers and many comments

f. The Project database

All interviews and focus groups were contemporaneously noted, with an emphasis on collecting as many complete verbatim quotes as possible. These Word files were then entered into the NVivo program for coding and analysis. NVivo (produced by QSR International) is coding software used widely by qualitative researchers which has become an “industry standard” over the past decade.

A file was created for each SRL and each service provider whom we interviewed or spoke to in a focus group. These files initially comprised the (contemporaneously noted) transcript of that discussion. SRL files were frequently electronically updated with subsequent email communications and in some cases, a full follow-up interview. Where a previously interviewed SRL contributed to a Facebook page discussion, this was also added into their file. Comments made by a SRL who had not been interviewed via Facebook, were held in a separate section of the database. Interviews were then anonymized and are identified in this Report by either these numeric/alphabetic codes or by a specially created pseudonym (in this Report).

The resulting database is very large. The SRL interviews and focus group transcripts, Facebook commentary, and service provider interviews were separated into different source sections in the database allowing us to manipulate the data across and within these sections. This work was managed by Raman Pandher, under the supervision of the Principal Investigator.

An initial set of codes (described in the NVivo program as “nodes”) were created by the Principal Investigator for the SRL interviews and another set of codes for the service provider interviews. Raman began the detailed process of adding these codes to selected text in the files, line-by-line. After the first 20 files had been coded in each section, we reviewed the codes and added some new ones while merging others. The same process was repeated after Raman had coded another 20 files. This brought us to a settled set of codes for each section – SRL’s and service providers. The complete list of final codes is provided at Appendix F (SRL Interview Codes) and Appendix G (Service Provider Interview Codes). Raman then went back to the beginning and coded all files in each section using these codes.

In addition NVivo allows each file to have a number of variables attached, allowing for sorting and correlations among these, and among variables and codes. This is where the demographics collected for the SRL’s were entered and enable the demographic analysis of the SRL sample presented at (2) below.

g. Methodological and sampling strengths and limitations

Qualitative research has much to recommend it when exploring a topic that implicates personal, subjective experiences (here the experience of self representation), including being able to remain open-minded about what one will discover without a priori assumptions. The depth and complexity of data collected in interviews and focus groups has many advantages over information collected via quantitative methods such as closed question surveys. In-depth interviewing with subjects about their experiences can quickly produce patterns and consistent themes. Many important and influential qualitative studies rely on sample sizes of a few dozen. This study has a very large sample (a total of almost 400 interviews) for a qualitative study.

Moreover, the consistency with which the themes emerge from coding both the SRL and the service provider data is extremely high. In addition and interestingly, service provider data (for example, how service providers describe the expectations and frustration of SRL’s) mirrors SRL responses to these same questions in interviews, providing important triangulation.

The demographic data collected from SRL’s is described in detail at (2) below. The results are consistent among the three provinces with no significant differences. The study reached a wide range of individuals in both urban and more rural communities who are representing themselves in court. The sample broke down almost exactly 50/50 male/female, and contains a reasonable range of socio-economic and educational variables (subject to the caveat that research studies tend to attract a more educated demographic, see below). The breakdown between family and civil litigants also reflects the general trend.

The sample did not record race or ethnicity. It is not possible therefore to estimate how much or little representation the SRL sample includes of people of color and First Nations people. In several sites extensive efforts were made to connect to the First Nations community, by talking with Native Court Workers, displaying information at Native Friendship Centres and other First Nations agencies. In one case, a field site court worker took Project materials on to local reservations where she spoke about the Project. Nonetheless, we believe the representation of First Nations people is very small in the sample. This is regrettable since many First Nations people find themselves self-representing – in fact the best way we found to connect to these individuals was always by meeting them in the courthouses. Judging by the composition of the focus groups, racial diversity may also be limited.

Qualitative research of this kind does not aim to produce statistically significant findings (the purview of a high volume quantitative study). This means that the findings that are presented below are only occasionally presented in terms of raw numbers or proportions. Many of the themes that the interviews reveal are multi-layered and interwoven, and attaching numbers or percentages to the study findings would be misleading. Instead, in common with practice for the presentation of qualitative research, the term “many” denotes a finding that emerges from more than half the interviews, “most” denotes a finding that emerges from more than three quarters of the interviews, and “some” denotes a finding that, although a common theme, emerges from less than half but more than one quarter of the interviews. Where the Report refers only to “a few” this references a group smaller than one quarter of the sample, but may contain an important and strongly expressed perspective.

Given the context of this research in exploring (in the case of more than 50% of the SRL sample) professional relationships between lawyers and clients, and in almost all cases the interaction of SRL’s with members of the judiciary, another important qualification is appropriate. Clearly, the descriptions that SRL’s provide in interviews of their experiences with both legal counsel and judges reflect their subjective perceptions and understanding of what occurred in that relationship or interaction. It is not presented here as “fact” or “reality”.

How individuals make sense of their experience is at the heart of the qualitative endeavor. It is important not to dismiss qualitative findings as “only” the subjective “misperceptions and misunderstandings” of lay litigants. That would miss the point. What is more important here is the volume of the study data, the rigor of the data analysis and the consistency of the findings that emerges from this study of the complex and changing relationship between the users of the Canadian justice system and the system insiders (lawyers, judges, court staff).

2. SRL Sample Analysis

259 SRL’s from the three provinces participated in the study. This includes individuals who participated in a focus group, as well as those who were interviewed in person or by telephone. 230 SRL’s provided complete demographic data (below). A total of 283 interviews were conducted with SRL’s. This number includes follow up and secondary interviews (including follow up interviews with focus group participants), but does not include other forms of informal subsequent communication (eg email). The total interview numbers are provided at Appendix A.

27% of the SRL respondents came through the toll free line, and 43% via the project email/ website. The remaining 30% of the sample either attended focus groups at the courthouses, joined the Facebook group and then participated in an interview, or contacted us directly following local publicity.

a. SRL’s by province

The number of SRL respondents in British Columbia and Alberta was slightly higher than in Ontario, probably a result of the difficulty accessing courthouse sites in Ontario and the shorter data collection period. Nonetheless, Ontario respondents still constitute almost a third of the total SRL data collected (Fig 1 below). In addition, a slightly higher number of service providers were interviewed in Ontario than in the other two provinces (below).
By the end of the study, the field sites in British Columbia and Alberta had provided the majority of SRL’s respondents in each of these provinces, with a smaller but significant group from “other” provincial locations. These were SRL’s who had heard an item on the radio about the Project, or read about it in the newspaper, or who had happened upon the Project website.

In Ontario, SRL respondents from courthouses “other” than the primary three were close in number to those from the field sites. This was probably the result of the time spent trying to secure a third site in Ontario (above) while publicity and media interest reached people in other parts of the province. A complete breakdown of SRL respondents by field site and province is included at Appendix A.

b. SRL’s by court

60% of the sample were in family court, either provincial or divorce court. Of this group, a clear majority in each province were filed in the divorce court (65% of BC family SRL’s in Supreme, 85% of Alberta family SRL’s in Queen’s Bench, and 77% of Ontario family SRL’s in Superior Court) and a smaller group in provincial family court. The proportions of family / civil/ small claims litigants in each provincial sample group was consistent to within one or two percentage points.

15 For a complete breakdown of respondents by province and field site, see Appendix A.
The fact that 60% of our sample was appearing in family courts is most likely a reflection of the higher numbers of SRL’s in family court compared to other civil courts (above small claims) throughout Canada. For example, in British Columbia 57% of litigants appearing in provincial court under the Family Relations Act (2011 figures) were self-represented, compared with 35% of family litigants in Supreme Court and 21% of general civil litigants in Supreme Court\textsuperscript{16}. In Calgary Alberta, 39% of litigants in divorce hearings and 46% of litigants in family proceedings were representing themselves on the day of the hearing, compared with 18% of general civil litigants (also 2011 figures)\textsuperscript{17}.

18% of the SRL sample was appearing in the first instance civil court in their jurisdiction (Supreme, Superior, Queens Bench). 13% were appearing in small claims courts (up to $25,000) where historically there have been higher numbers of SRL’s. A further 9% reported acting as SRL’s in tribunals (for example, before provincial Labor Relations Board, provincial Residential Tenancies Tribunals, provincial Human Rights Commissions).

c. SRL’s by gender

The SRL sample was almost exactly half men and half women (52% and 48% respectively). This was consistent across the three provinces. 63% were acting as plaintiffs or petitioners, and 37% as defendants or respondents. 25% of the cases were concluded at the time of interview, usually fairly recently although a few went back several years. The remaining cases were ongoing and many of these were updated via email, or a secondary interview.

In family court, more men than women were respondents (64% of the men versus 38% of the women) and more women were applicants than men (62% of the women versus 36% of the men). Gender differences also showed up among family court respondents in relation to income (and to a lesser extent in relation to age). 75% of women litigants reported an annual income of under $50,000 compared to 42% of men.

d. SRL’s by age

The largest single group of SRL’s by age were the over 50’s (45% of the sample). The next largest group was 40-50 (32%). Only 4% of the sample was under 30 year of age. This is consistent with other studies that suggest that SRL’s are more often middle aged than young people. The Ontario sample was slightly (but marginally) older than the other two provinces.

Fig 3: SRL’s by age
e. SRL’s by income

When it came to income, the most significant cluster (57%) in the SRL sample reported income of less than $50,000 a year and 40% (the largest single group) reported incomes of less than $30,000 a year.

Fig 4: SRL’s by income

This breakdown of income level was highly consistent among the three provinces.

This data is consistent with other studies that have collected survey type data on SRL income. First, most studies concur that SRL’s are more likely to be individuals with lower incomes (below $30-35,000). For example, the British Columbia Supreme Court Self-Help Information Centre Final Evaluation Report (henceforth BC evaluation) reported that 60% of their SRL users had incomes of $2000 a month and under\(^\text{19}\). In a 2004 Nova Scotia study conducted by the Court Services division of the Nova Scotia Department of Justice (henceforth Nova Scotia study), 60% of SRL’s had incomes below $30,000\(^\text{20}\). The same study reported that 28% of SRL’s that responded to a survey had incomes of between $30-60,000. An early and comprehensive survey of SRL’s in the United States, conducted by Bruce Sales, Connie Beck and Richard Haan, for the American Bar Association in 1993 found that half the respondents had incomes under $30,000 and that SRL’s in this income range were significantly more likely to self-represent than those in higher income brackets.21

However it is also noteworthy that almost 20% of our SRL sample placed their income between $50-75,000 and 12% between $75-100,000. 6% reported that their annual income was more than $100,000. It is noteworthy that many of those in the higher income bands reported spending significant sums on legal fees before becoming self-represented (discussed further below at). The percentage of SRL’s falling into a somewhat higher income bracket appears to be larger in this study than in many others (for example, a New York study in 2005 found just 4% of SRL’s in family and housing court in New York City earned above $50,000 22; the Nova Scotia study found just 10% reporting an income above $60,00023), but this might be explained by adjustment for inflation/ regional differences in income. The inclusion of more higher income earners in this study may be a sign of the times, as the overall numbers of SRL’s in the justice system grows each year24.

The number of SRL’s in a higher income bracket reported here reflects the growing gap between the means of middle income earners and the affordability of legal services, as well as the phenomenon of “expended resources” – 53% of the SRL sample in this study had previously retained a lawyer to represent them, but had run out of funds to continue to pay them.

23See note 20 above at page 26. However note that incomes are generally lower in Nova Scotia than everywhere in Canada aside from PEI (see for example The Chronicle Herald, “Nova Scotians losing the wage race” May 31, 2012)
24See further details at (3) below.
This level of respondent education was fairly consistent across the provinces, although the Ontario sample reported a slightly lower level of university education than the other two provinces – at 45% - whereas in Alberta 66% of SRL’s reported having a university degree and in BC, 62%. If those with either a college or a university education are combined, 78% fell into this group in Ontario, 76% in Alberta and 83% in BC.

The high level of education reported by the SRL sample may be explained in part by the tendency of voluntary opt-in research studies such as this one to attract participants with a higher level of education and comfort with the idea of a research study. In other Canadian studies, educational levels vary considerably depending on geography. The Nova Scotia study found that 17% of SRL respondents had a university degree, 7% at the graduate level. In the British Columbia study, 60% had some form of completed post-secondary education (sub-categories are not provided).

There is also evidence to suggest that the educational demographics of the SRL sample are roughly similar to the general Canadian population. Statistics Canada reported in 2008 that 58% of 25-34 year old across Canada had a tertiary education, and 40% of 55-

---

25 Regardless of the study topic or method, participation has been shown to be generally higher among those with higher education than the general population. This is attributed in part to greater faith in research, no matter what the topic, and a greater level of volunteerism in general. See Galea S. & Tracy, M. "Participation Rates in Epidemiologic Studies" 17 Annuals of Epidemiology (9) (2007) 643 at 647

64 year olds\textsuperscript{29}.

The tertiary level education of so many SRL’s in the sample may be reflected in their widespread expectation \textit{at the outset} that they would be able to navigate the justice system without legal representation, even though they might have preferred to have counsel. The reality for many however is that despite their prior education and knowledge they still find the system difficult to understand, and far more intellectually and practically challenging than they had initially expected.

Many SRL’s commented that if it were so difficult for them, how much more so would it be for others without a similar level of education? Or for an individual for whom English or French is not their first language? 83\% of the sample had English or French as a first language. 13 other first languages were represented amongst the sample.

\textbf{g. Previous legal representation in this action}

At the time of their interview, all the SRL respondents were representing themselves. However more than half – 53\% - had retained a lawyer at some point in their case. Three quarters of these had retained a private lawyer (the remainder had been legally aided, but this was now discontinued\textsuperscript{30}). A few respondents had gone back and forth with representation, retaining them when they could afford to or were especially anxious about going forward without representation, but became self-represented once again when their funds ran out. This is a significant finding and its implications are discussed further below.

\textbf{h. Legal representation of the other party to the action}

75\% of the SRL’s in the sample reported that the other party in their family or civil case was represented by counsel – in other words, that this was a matter in which one side was represented by counsel and the other was not. It was not always clear whether representation by counsel on the other side continued throughout the case – sometimes it seemed that the other side, like the respondent, had counsel make some appearances for them and in other instances they represented themselves. Of the remaining cases, 15\% reported that both sides were self-represented (10\% were unassigned). Like the other variables reported in this section, this variable is manipulated in the data analysis below to ascertain if it is a significant factor in shaping the particular experience of the SLR.

\textsuperscript{29} \textit{Education Indicators in Canada: An International Perspective} (2010) Statistics Canada at page 30. Note that tertiary education includes college education; 26\% of Canadian adults had a college level tertiary education (reported 2006) and 34\% of Canadian adults had a university level tertiary education (reported 2007) (at page 16).

i. Mental health issues

Researchers elsewhere have found a causal relationship between mental health issues and legal problems\textsuperscript{31}. Without the necessary clinical and diagnostic expertise, any reflection on the extent to which mental health issues existed among the SRL sample is, of course, speculative only. That said, the widespread assumption that many SRL’s are mentally ill makes it seem important to present a “lay” impression of how many of the respondents in the SRL sample may have been suffering from a mental illness.

A minimum of 45 minutes was spent with each person interviewed – sometimes by phone, sometimes in person – and some interviews lasted much longer (up to 90 minutes). In some cases, there were follow-up interviews and other contacts over email. From this time a sense of the individual’s (e.g., stability, consistency, accuracy and emotional lability could be broadly gleaned). It is important to emphasize that this is not a diagnostic effort, but a reflection on the part of the interviewer on the stability of the interview subjects.

Of the 259 SRL respondents, just eight individuals stand out as demonstrating enough emotional instability to indicate that they possibly suffered from a mental illness of some kind. None of these respondents are quoted in this Report, although it is interesting to note that many of their insights were fully consistent with other accounts. This figure does not include individuals who were distressed (many were) or depressed (another smaller group) as a result of their experiences as a SRL, including the circumstances that brought them to the courts.

This unscientific assessment suggests that just over 3% of the sample may have been suffering from a mental illness. This is consistent with estimates of the prevalence of mental health problems in the general population that suggests, for example, that 1% of the population suffer from bi-polar disorder and a further 1% from schizophrenia\textsuperscript{32}.

The SRL respondents in this study were sometimes distressed and angry about their experiences, but with very few exceptions they were not, insofar as it could be ascertained from limited contact with them, mentally ill. It does not appear, therefore, that the SRL sample in this study was characterized by a higher prevalence of mental illness than the population at large.

3. The SRL explosion: how many people are representing themselves in family and civil court?

The numbers are extraordinary.

\textsuperscript{31} See for example Pleasance P and Balmer NJ “Mental Health and the Experience of Social Problems Involving Rights” 16(1) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law (2009). The same article points out the causal connection between experiences of the courts and legal issues and deteriorating mental health. See the further discussion below at (12)(b)
\textsuperscript{32} See for example http://www.cmha.ca/media/fast-facts-about-mental-illness
a. Family court

Figures provided by the provincial ministries of justice show that the proportion of litigants appearing pro se in provincial family court is consistently at or above 40%, and in some cases far higher. In proceedings under the Divorce Act, the figures are lower but still significant.

For example,

- In Alberta in 2011, 40% of hearings in provincial court on family matters included one or more SRL’s. In the Queen’s Bench, the figure was 32%.\(^{33}\)
- In British Columbia in 2011, 57% of hearings held under the British Columbia Family Relations Act included one or both SRL’s. In the British Columbia Supreme Court, self-representation was running at 35%.\(^{34}\)

In both Alberta and British Columbia the actual number of SRL’s is probably yet higher, because this data only reflects whether or not an individual is represented at the time of a hearing – we know from interviews with SRL’s and court staff that some SRL’s will bring an agent to represent them in a hearing, but otherwise handle their case on their own behalf.

In Ontario, data on representation is recorded at the time of filing. Also unlike the other provinces, the Ontario data combines filings in the Ontario Court of Justice and the Superior Court (ie both family and divorce matters).

- Figures from Ontario show that throughout the whole province in 2011/12, 64% of individuals involved in applications under either the Family Law Act, the Children’s Law Reform Act or the Divorce Act were self-represented at the time of filing. In two of Toronto’s busy downtown courthouses, Jarvis Avenue and Sheppard Avenue, the figures were 73% and 74% respectively. These numbers are likely to be an under-estimate since both the SRL sample and court staff attested to the significant number of individuals who begin the legal process with a lawyer, but then become self-represented after expending all their resources and/or becoming dissatisfied with their legal counsel\(^{35}\).

Data recording strategies in relation to self-representation are just emerging, and the inconsistency among the provinces in the way in which this information is recorded requires immediate attention. This also makes it difficult to accurately pinpoint the timing of the rise in the percentage of SRL’s, but many court staff stated in interviews that they believed that the steepest increases occurred up to ten years ago, reflecting the decline in provincial family Legal Aid budgets. What data does exist seems to be largely anecdotal and collected piecemeal by particular judges or lawyers who were concerned at what they were seeing in the courts. For example, Lynne Cohen writing in Canadian Lawyer in 2001 claims that the number of SRL’s in Ontario’s Unified Family Court rose by 500 percent between 1995 and 1999. David Tavender, a leading Alberta practitioner, stated at a 2012 conference that the number of parties appearing in Alberta Family Law Chambers who are self-represented has increased 160% since 2006. The precise basis for these claims is not clear but presumably draws on data provided by the courts to these researchers.

In order to get a more detailed picture of the increase in the numbers of SRL’s, it is instructive to draw on figures from the California family court system (North America’s highest volume jurisdiction) that go back to the 1970’s. In 1971, self-represented litigants constituted 1% of all litigants in California family court. By 1992 this had risen to 46% and to 77% by 2000. By 2004, 80% of all cases included at least one SRL by the time of judgment.

b. Civil court

The same trend is spreading to civil courts, with some lower level civil courts reporting more than 70% of litigants as self represented. This goes much further than small claims courts, which are designed to facilitate simple, speedy and inexpensive resolution and in which litigants have traditionally often represented themselves. However, the rise in the small claims court upper limit to $25,000 in all three participating provinces means that increasingly SRL’s in small claims court are managing cases that have previously been handled by legal counsel or para-legals. In British Columbia in 2011, 80% of litigants in small claims court were self-represented at the time of their court appearance.

Self-representation is also growing in the courts of first instance, that is, above the $25,000 boundary. For example in the Ontario Superior Court, figures collected in 1999 found SRL’s outnumbering represented litigants by 1.6 to 1. That gap will certainly be far larger 12 years on. In the British Columbia Supreme Court, 2011 figures report that 21% of general civil litigants are unrepresented in their appearance before the court, 19% in foreclosure hearings, and perhaps less surprising, 34% of bankruptcy petitions. This can be compared to figures produced by the British Columbia Justice Review Task Force covering two-week periods in 1999-2001 that showed that the number of self-represented 41 Note that the possibility of raising the small claims limit to $50,000 is under discussion in some provinces.

litigants in the Supreme Court varied from 5.5% to 14.2%. In the Alberta Court of Queen’s Bench, 19% of those appearing at civil hearings were representing themselves. A similar trend is spreading to the civil appeal courts, highlighted recently by the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada.

c. Predispositions towards lawyers and other sources of professional advice

Concern is sometimes expressed that the drop in the number of parties with legal representation reflects a general public malaise towards the legal profession – in short, that SRL’s are predisposed to mistrust and even dislike lawyers. There is evidence of general public dissatisfaction and skepticism about the value of all professional advice (affected no doubt by the access to information provided by the Internet for which professionals have historically acted as gatekeepers), as well as a general decline in deference towards professional advisors.

Alternatively or as well, the trend away from professional services and towards a “DIY” approach may be more closely related to the availability of information on the Internet, and the growing assumption that this allows for self-help in areas that have previously required professional advice and support, than any particular dislike or mistrust of lawyers. The trend towards “DIY” and cutting out professional advisors has been noted by sociologists (who have dubbed “disintermediation”) as operating in a variety of arenas formerly dominated by professional advisors including financial planning, real estate and property transactions, and law. The result is fewer gatekeepers or “middle men”, displaced by the availability of information on the World Wide Web. Some SRL respondents mentioned that they were initially encouraged to believe that they could handle representing themselves because so much information was available on-line; as one put it, “Google is my lawyer.” This reinforces the trend towards self-representation because it provides an increasingly normative argument to reject the use of legal counsel.

It seemed important, therefore, to establish what, if any, previous experience and pre-disposition SRL respondents had towards lawyers and legal services. We asked all SRL...

49 ABS7. The experience of many SRL’s as they spent more time exploring on-line resources was often disappointing (see further detail below at (7)(b)).
respondents whether they had retained a lawyer in any previous matter (prompting them with, for example, writing your will, or a real estate matter?"\textsuperscript{50}). 73% said that they had used a lawyer for a previous dispute or transaction. We then asked these same individuals if they could rank their experience as “mostly positive” “acceptable, OK” or “mostly negative”. Fully one third did not provide this assessment or found it difficult to generalize in this way\textsuperscript{51}. Of those who, the largest group (39%) said that their experience had been good or mostly good. A further 25% said that the experience had been “OK”, with nothing significant to complain about. 35% said that their experience had been bad or mostly bad.

The results for each SRL respondent were then correlated with whether or not they had originally retained legal counsel in this matter. 53% of the SRL sample had previously had legal representation (for the most part a private lawyer; see detail at 4(a)) but by the time they were interviewed, no longer had counsel representing them.

Of the group who had previously worked with a lawyer on a different matter or transaction, two thirds or 66% retained counsel for this action, working with them until the relationship ended and they became self-represented. Of those stating that “mistrust” of a lawyer or lawyers in general was a significant factor in their decision to self-represent\textsuperscript{52}, only one in five had had prior experience of legal representation.

75 SRL’s had worked with legal counsel on a previous matter and provided their assessment (“good”, “bad” or “OK”) of their previous experience and initially retained counsel for this action. The prior experiences of this group with counsel were very mixed. Almost half of of this group (47%) said that their prior experience was “good”, but a further 31% who assessed their prior experience as “bad” also began with a lawyer in the action in which they were now self-representing. Another group (n=39) who provided an assessment of their previous experience with legal counsel and who did not retain counsel at any stage in this matter were a similarly mixed bag. 26% assessed their prior experience as “good”, 44% who assessed their prior experience as “bad” and 31% assessed their prior experience as “OK”.

This analysis suggests that where a SRL respondent emphasized factors relating to their experience with a lawyer or lawyers in their decision to represent themselves, they are more likely to be referencing their (earlier) experience with legal counsel in the present matter, than a pre-disposition.

\textsuperscript{50} See the SRL Interview Template at Appendix E

\textsuperscript{51} The somewhat primitive scale of “good” “bad” and “OK” was used here to avoid getting into further detail about previous experiences of legal representation; however this made the questions somewhat crude and difficult to answer for some respondents, especially if they had had more than one experience of prior legal representation, with mixed results.

\textsuperscript{52} 20% of the sample described their mistrust of lawyers as a factor in their decision to self-represent (although in most of these cases, money was also an issue: see further detail below at (4)).
When correlated with their decision to retain counsel in the present case it appears that that a prior experience with legal counsel may have had some influence, but was not dispositive in their decision to self-represent. Further, this past experience appears to have had only a limited impact on their initial decision to retain counsel, which was more directly related to what they felt they could afford. Where a SRL respondent emphasized factors relating to their experience with a lawyer or lawyers in their decision to represent themselves, they are more likely to be referencing their (earlier) experience with legal counsel in the present matter, than a pre-disposition.

Where factors other than affordability come into play, the most significant influence on the decision to self represent appears to be negative experiences with lawyers in the present matter, rather than prior experience and pre-disposition. Bob’s story is typical.

When Bob faced an acrimonious divorce, it was natural for him to retain a lawyer. He earned a good salary – in excess of $100,000 – and hoped to use mediation to resolve the issues between himself and his wife. One year later, Bob had spent $80,000 on legal fees and was no closer to resolving a dispute over their assets. He now faced a trial, and with the proceeds from the sale of the matrimonial home in trust, could not afford to pay counsel. Instead he hired a lawyer (at half the regular hourly rate) to sit at the back of the courtroom and advise him while he represented himself in his trial.

d. Considering alternatives to legal process

All respondents were asked what they did prior to commencing or becoming involved in legal action to resolve their dispute. Some clearly felt they were left with no choice because they were named as defendants/respondents. Those who initiated the case themselves (63% of the sample) could sometimes point to efforts they made – via direct personal communication such as phone calls or letters or emails – to resolve the issue short of court. Some had made these efforts – unsuccessfully – for a significant period of time (up to a year or 18 months) before commencing action.

27% of SRL respondents (the vast majority of them plaintiffs) were coded as having given consideration to alternatives before litigation, including mediation, private arbitration and counseling, and other efforts at settlement with the other side (meetings, letters etc). A somewhat higher level of education appeared to correlate with consideration of alternatives to litigation. 64% of those who considered alternatives were university-educated, higher than the general level of the whole sample (50%). Similarly 28% were college educated, slightly higher than the level in the whole sample (23%).

We also asked service providers what they knew or believed about the extent to which clients had previously attempted to resolve their dispute short of commencing or becoming involved in ongoing legal action. This question is rarely explicitly asked by a service provider, and even less often at the court registry, so their comments are based on tangential discussions about alternatives with SRL’s and their knowledge of individual cases. The almost universal perception, however, is that SRL’s often do very little before coming to the court, preferring to turn the problem “over” to the justice system.

“The justice system is the first place that they turn to for help...I think that people are so quick to litigate – but if they knew what it actually was, what would happen, they might look at other options.”

“People keep coming to the courthouse because they believe in the system and want to be heard. They still have regard for the authority of the system – who else do you go to for authority? When they get a result, they attribute it to the system, not to the individual or individuals who made it happen. The system begins to substitute for having to deal directly with the other side.”

“Very few understand that there are really alternatives – and few have thought about trying to have a conversation.”

Part Two: Decision-Making over Self-Representation

4. Why are so many people representing themselves in family and civil court?

What is not in dispute is that the number of individuals representing themselves in both family and civil court has risen sharply. More complex is unraveling the reasons why.

Many of the SRL respondents spoke of more than one reason why they were representing themselves (although some said that it was just about money, and nothing else). It is clear that once a decision has been taken to move forward without legal representation, the experiences of that individual will also shape how they respond to a question about why they are self-representing (for example, with more or less self-confidence, with more or less emphasis on their disappointment with earlier legal services). Responses to the question “why are you self-representing” also reflected a personal sense of just what was possible and manageable for that individual. For example, some were despondent and overwhelmed, a smaller number were defiant and bullish, and this emotional response also affected the way in which they would describe the reasons for self-representing.

a. Financial reasons

By far the most consistently cited reason for self-representation was the inability to afford to retain, or to continue to retain, legal counsel.

Almost every respondent (more than 90% of the sample) – across all three provinces and whether in family or civil court – referred in some way to financial reasons for representing themselves. This is consistent with other studies, although reported at a higher level here. The reason for this may lie in the research methodology adopted and the way the question is asked. Some people are uncomfortable acknowledging a lack of financial resources, for obvious reasons. In this study, respondents participated in extended (up to 90 minute) interviews which ranged across many aspects of their self-representation experience and the interviewees frequently returned, over and over, to the question of cost and affordability. While cost was clearly a major factor in self-representation for almost every respondent, many SRL’s were explicit about their inability to pay for legal counsel, while others were more circumspect and advanced a range of blended reasons for self representation of which money was just one. Sometimes respondents became more open and frank about the impact of cost as the interview went on. This is a different way of collecting this data – and arguable more accurate – than asking individuals to complete a closed question survey.

More than half the interviews, however, contain detailed descriptions of lack of or exhaustion of financial resources.

"I have no choice. It's not that I think that I can do this better than a lawyer, I have no choice.

I don't have $350 an hour to pay a lawyer"

57 For example, in Nicolas Bala and Rachel Birbaum’s recent survey of family SRL’s in Ontario, they report that 49% of survey respondents stated that financial considerations were the primary factor in their decision to self-represent. See Bala N & Birbaum R, “The Rise of Self-Representation in Canada’s Family Courts” paper prepared for the National Family Law Program, Halifax Nova Scotia 2012 at 10. See also Langan A-M, “Threatening the Balance of the Scales of Justice: Unrepresented Litigants in the Family Courts of Ontario” 30 Queen’s Law Journal (2005) 825 reports that 83% of the unrepresented lawyers in Kingston family court reported that they were unable to afford a lawyer. See also similar conclusions reached by Gayla Reid, Donna Senniw, and John Malcolmson, Developing Models for Coordinated Services for Self-Representing Litigants: Mapping Services, Gaps, Issues and Needs Law Courts Education Society of BC, 2004, available at http://www.lawcourtsed.ca/documents/research/srl_mapping_repo.pdf.)

58 AB37. This respondent and a number of others referred to their expectation or experience that private legal services would cost in the region of $300-400 an hour. Some have speculated that individuals who do not retain lawyers because they are concerned
“I can’t feed my children – and the judge is telling me to hire a lawyer."

i. SRL’s who have self-represented throughout the process

Circumstances under which the costs of legal representation became a primary motivation for self-representation vary from case to case. Some respondents said that they had never had the means to engage a lawyer; many of these said that the initial retainer was simply out of their reach, while others said that they realized how quickly the hourly costs would mount up and that they simply could not afford to pay this. Many of these respondents spoke with resentment about the number of times they were told that they “ought to” hire a lawyer to represent them – by a judge, the lawyer on the other side, or by a counter clerk. The same message is repeated throughout many court forms that SRL’s try to complete by themselves. These admonishments suggest that a person representing themselves could afford to hire a lawyer, but chooses not to.

An objective assessment of whether or not legal services are in fact “affordable” by individual clients is of course not possible. Most court administrators and service providers agree that Legal Aid eligibility is now set so low for family and civil clients that many people genuinely cannot afford a lawyer, yet do not qualify for Legal Aid. At the same time a few service providers pointed out that those who came to the court asserting that they could not afford the services of a lawyer nonetheless drove expensive cars or took foreign holidays. Far more service providers however emphasized that if they needed to retain counsel they would be in the same position as the SRL’s they saw – unable to afford legal counsel. Moreover several of the (n=4) lawyer SRL’s in the sample made the observation that they could not afford themselves.

Any assessment of what people can “afford” is complexified by the fact that contemporary consumers – and many SRL’s - have expectations of a relationship between service and cost that means that they do not accept that the work performed by legal counsel should be as costly as it is. There is a reluctance to pay rates of $350-400 an hour for work that the client often feels that they have little control over, and no real means of scrutinizing whether they are receiving value-for-money.

Changes in attitudes towards the role of professional advisors – including the so-called “death of deference” towards professionals and a growing disinclination to pay for “middle man” services such as financial, legal, real estate or other advice (described by about the cost do not in fact have a clear idea of what that cost would be. This sample seemed fairly well-informed about legal costs (and more than half had previously retained counsel and so knew precisely what that had cost them).

sociologists as “dis-intermediation” results in significant skepticism among would-be consumers about paying counsel at this level that over a period of weeks, months or even years. The resulting costs would, at best, be high if not very high and would probably require other sacrifices that individuals may not be prepared to make. For many low and middle-income families, the eventual costs of legal counsel may be simply beyond the reach of their income. As some of the higher income earners in the sample illustrated, even those earning more than $100,000 may eventually see expenditures in excess of $50,000 as a poor use of their resources. One high-income professional described a social gathering at her home in which the guests compared their expenditures on their divorces:

“Of the ten adults (at the party) six had been divorced. The combined spending on legal costs of those six adults - $1.2 million.”

It is important to realize that these individuals do not see themselves as more competent than legal counsel – on the contrary, they knew that they were taking on a huge challenge and many were overwhelmed at the prospect (“scared to death”, “absolutely terrified” were common comments about the task ahead). What has changed is that however hard, that self-representation is now at least a theoretical possibility given the widespread access to information on the World Wide Web. Lawyers are no longer the “gatekeepers” for this information.

Some of these SRL’s are making a simple cost/benefit assessment and concluded that by saving legal costs they will still come out ahead, even if they recover less in dollars than they might with legal representation.

“Even if I could not get as much spousal or child support as with a lawyer, if I factored in the legal fees I would be worse off by hiring the lawyers....I did not consider myself as skilled as a competent lawyer, but at the end I figured I would still end up ahead if I represented myself.”

Some of these respondents described trying to find a lawyer who would represent them on an “unbundled” basis i.e. without paying a retainer, which they could not afford, and instead working on a task-by-task, hourly basis. Very few SRL’s who had never hired

65 Unbundling” has been debated for more than 30 years and has been pioneered by Woody (Forest) Mosten. legal counsel at any stage in their case were able to access legal services this way in the first instance and therefore felt they had no alternative but to represent themselves.66

ii. SRL’s who had received Legal Aid

13% of the SRL sample had been represented by a Legal Aid funded lawyer earlier in their case, but their Legal Aid entitlement had run out and/or their financial circumstances had changed and they had been told they were no longer eligible for Legal Aid. They were now self-representing because they were unable to afford to pay for private legal counsel. Some still owed money to Legal Aid (where their representation was in the form of a “loan”67).

Some respondents had applied for and had been turned down for Legal Aid.68 Others had not even attempted to apply, assuming that they would not qualify and discomforted at the idea of being turned away (similar anxieties seem to affect some individual willingness to approach free legal clinics or duty counsel, see below).69

iii. SRL’s who cannot afford to continue with counsel

More than half – 53% - of the SRL sample had retained a lawyer at some point in their case. Three quarters of these had retained a private lawyer (the remainder had been legally aided, but this was now discontinued). These respondents had exhausted their available resources and were often resentful that despite significant expenditures, they were still not at the end of their matter.

It is evidently very common for a litigant to begin with private representation (for example at the time of filing an application) but to lose representation later on70. These 67 For example, from the Alberta Legal Aid website “Legal aid in the province of Alberta is not free. LAA expects clients to repay the costs of their legal representation. Any services requiring full representation by a lawyer are not free. However, it is important to know that legal services provided by a lawyer through LAA are significantly less costly than hiring that same lawyer privately.” www.legalaid.ab.ca. In Ontario this is called a “contribution agreement” which requires the repayment of some or all of the legal fees. See www.legalaid.on.ca. There does not appear to be a similar policy in BC.

68 See further detail below at (10) (b)
69 For example, a small number of BC respondents had been legally aided in their original application (eg for a divorce) but could not be legally aided in seeking a variation. The British Columbia Legal Services Society website states that an individual will only qualify for legal representation for a serious family matter once. It also appears that a variation would only be covered for legal representation if it involves a “serious situation involving a child.” (www.lss.bc.ca).
70 Note that this suggests that Ontario court recorded data on numbers of family SRL’s is an under-estimate, since this is recorded only at the time of filing (see above at (3)(a)). This trend raises important questions about the circumstances in which lawyers “get off the record”. Professional Codes of Conduct have traditionally dealt with this issue by requiring that a lawyer give reasonable notice to the client (obviously not at issue if it is the client who decides to end the relationship) and a general admonition that withdrawal of representation should not seriously prejudice the client. See for example, Law Society of Alberta, Code of Professional Conduct, Rule 2.07(3) Law Society of British Columbia, Professional Conduct Handbook, Rule 2.07(3). In light of this growing trend, these provisions need re-consideration and clarification. Note that a recent Supreme Court of Canada decision (R v Cunningham (2010) SCC 10) considered the respondents said that they were no longer able to find the necessary funds to continue with legal representation – it was not unusual for them to still owe money to their lawyers and to be paying this back in instalments. Others who had borrowed money from family members or friends to pay for legal services had reached the point at which they could not bring themselves to go back and ask for a further loan.

Others ended their relationship with their legal representative when they found that they had reached the point that they would have to dip into other savings to pay for legal services – for example, a college fund for one of their children – and were unwilling to do so.

“I don’t feel like dropping $12,000 that could be used for my child’s education down the road. Instead to use it on something as meaningless as this – it would not be a good use of money.”71

“I have some savings to put to good use or I could use it for more litigation.”72

35 interviews record the dollar amount of expenditures on legal services. These numbers range from as much as $300,000 to $400073 with eight describing legal costs of over $100,000 and another ten spending between $30-100,000.

A smaller group (n=12) were mostly representing themselves but would hire legal assistance at particularly crucial or difficult moments in their case. Perhaps they were offered financial assistance by a family member or friend, or were panicked followed a particularly traumatic court appearance, or perhaps they simply made a judgement that they needed help on a particular aspect of their case (document review, a court appearance). It was rare for SRL respondents to find counsel who would work on a task-by-task basis or “unbundle”74 services, despite considerable efforts sometimes made to find a lawyer who would work on this basis. Most of the SRL’s who did manage to find a lawyer who would help them on this basis were returning to their former counsel for these services.

Just like the SRL’s who could not afford a lawyer at any stage in their case, the majority of represented clients who became SRL’s did not make this move to represent themselves because they believed that they would do a better job than a competent client or because they felt confident that they could cope alone. Fred’s story is typical.

73 In some cases it felt intrusive to ask about this dollar amount and not every SRL was asked for this number in the earlier interviews; the significance of this issue only began to become apparent partway through the Project.

Fred was in dispute with his ex-wife over access to their young daughter. The Children’s Aid Society had become involved and for a period Fred co-operated with supervised access. When supervision was removed, his ex-wife refused him access under an interim order. After expending $80,000 in legal fees, Fred was out of funds.

Despite being well-educated and in a professional job Fred was not at all confident that he was going to be able to represent himself effectively – and the stakes were really high.

“I was scared out of my mind. But I had a hard choice – either learning to do this for myself, or letting my daughter go, forever. I didn’t know that even if I learned how to do this, anyone would believe me. But I could not give up without trying.” A year later Fred won access to his daughter after a five-day trial.

One important difference between interview data collected from SRL’s who had had counsel at an earlier stage in their case and those who self-represented throughout was that the former group frequently advanced detailed critiques of the legal services they had previously paid for and received.

b. Dissatisfaction with their legal representative

Many SRL’s were moderately or very dissatisfied with their legal representation earlier in this action. The overarching theme of these comments is that the legal services they paid for did not, in their view, represent value-for-money. This reflection was sometimes woven into their description of being unable to afford to continue with their lawyer. In these cases, respondent resentment at how much they had already spent, combined with a lack of belief that further engaging their lawyer would actually improve their situation, was an aspect of how they now rationised their decision to self-represent. The majority of these respondents also made it clear that they could no longer afford to retain counsel.

These respondents made a wide range of complaints about their former legal representatives. These deserve to be set out here in some detail because this data is prominent in many of the interview transcripts. Presenting this data does not assume that it is objectively “true”. Whatever the full story of these individual lawyer/client relationships – which we cannot know - what is clear is that many SRL’s felt that their lawyers did a poor job of explaining their role to them, why they were doing (or not doing) particular things, and generally, just why clients were being charged the amount they were for counsel’s services.

i. Counsel “doing nothing”

There is an extraordinarily widespread sentiment among many respondents that their former legal counsel did “nothing” to advance their case towards a realistic outcome. The word “nothing” appears repeatedly throughout the interview transcripts – for example, “nothing happened”; “my lawyer did nothing”; “nothing had been done”; “nothing was resolved”. Many SRL’s described difficulty getting updates from their lawyer as the weeks and months ticked by, despite repeated efforts to contact them.

Sometimes the grievance about “nothing” being done was framed around a related complaint that their former counsel had been unwilling to “stand up to” the lawyer on the other side. This was especially a problem in smaller communities, where clients were often keenly aware of the relationships among members of the local Bar - “we live in a small town and the lawyers all know each other” and the inevitable “pecking order” which some believed disadvantaged them if they had a less experienced, junior lawyer representing them. A more extreme version of this same complaint was the assertion made by SRL’s that they could not find anyone to represent them in their town because of the power and prestige of the lawyer on the other side.

ii. Counsel not interested in settling the case

Others went further to complain that their counsel had intentionally “dragged things out”, reflecting a common perception that lawyers deliberately slowed the process down in order to make more money from their clients. Connected to this perception that their case was becoming unnecessarily protracted, there was a widespread feeling that some lawyers were less interested than they should be in resolution. Instead, there were frequent observations of aggressive and adversarial behavior by counsel; “the two lawyers were just saber rattling, seeing who could piss the other off the most.” Many SRL’s bemoaned the general lack of settlement orientation among the lawyers they encountered. “A lawyer should have the wisdom and skill to modify their approach to resolve matters for all parties as opposed to putting fuel in the fire.”

There were numerous references to antipathy towards mediation by counsel (back). The following comment is typical: “He (this respondents’s former counsel) was not working to resolve the issues, but working for his payment.” Several respondents described commencing their divorce application with a tentative agreement between themselves and their spouse, which then fell apart once each retained counsel. Again, while it is not possible to independently verify these accounts, they contain many common elements (the lawyer not listening to the client, the lawyer ignoring the priorities of the client in favor of pursuing an outcome that the client was less interested in, and the lack of a plan for moving settlement forward).

iii. Difficulty finding counsel to take their case

A significant number of SRL’s describe “shopping around” for a lawyer but with no success. Some SRL’s complained that while they were willing to pay for legal services, they could not find a lawyer willing and competent to take their case on. These respondents described placing numerous phone calls to lawyer’s offices – sometimes as many as 15 or 20 – and sought recommendations from friends and from the court, but found that their calls were not returned or that counsel was not interested in taking their case. The reasons they said that they were given varied from “too complicated” to “too sensitive” - in other cases, the unspoken assumption was that the case was too small/ a losing proposition.

iv. Counsel not listening or explaining “My lawyer never asked me what my goals or my expectations were.”

There was a general feeling among many SRL’s that their former lawyers did not listen to them, either disregarding their specific instructions or, more commonly, not paying attention to what was really important to them. At minimum the narratives of these respondents suggest that their lawyers were not effective (perhaps did not give sufficient time to) explaining and evaluating different strategies with the client as a full partner in that discussion. Instead the lawyer appeared to the client to disregard their views and focus on taking charge. This may reflect an old fashioned perspective on the professional relationship as one between “expert: and “novice” that no longer works for many 21st century client. One respondent noted dryly that when she first “interviewed” prospective legal counsel (a new experience for some lawyers) “A lot of lawyers told me what they wanted to do as if it was them making the decision.”

Some SRL’s struggled with the uncertainty of the legal process. Whereas lawyers are familiar with the difficulty of offering certain results, many clients find it hard to understand how speculative the outcomes might be. At best, their legal counsel appear to have done a poor job of explaining the reasons why they cannot guarantee an outcome, and may exacerbate this by appearing unwilling to work with the client as a partner.

Jacob shopped around for a lawyer to represent him in his claim against his former employer. When he did find some with experience they wanted a very large retainer – $15-25,000 – and “they did not want me involved in the case.” “They wanted to ensure that they would do it their way, and my input would be not a significant part of the case.”

This left Jacob feeling “Why should I give you $15,000 without knowing if you can do any good or not?”

v. Counsel made mistakes/ was not competent

There were numerous complaints of “sloppy” work by lawyers. Some respondents acknowledged that while they were unable to determine the quality of counsel’s legal arguments, however:

“I am not in a position to judge someone’s legal work, but I can tell if someone had put in careful work, and the affidavits were not even proofed or edited.”

Other SRL’s went further, complaining that the lawyer they retained proved to be unfamiliar with the law and procedure relevant to their case, or even, in their view, “incompetent”. If there were mistakes or failings by counsel, the stress and immediacy of many family cases, and in particular those involving domestic violence, makes mismanagement or error by legal counsel even harder for the client to accept. One respondent described errors made by her legal counsel in making an application for a restraining order, which was subsequently set aside. “This was a very, very difficult time and I don’t appreciate that my safety was jeopardized but also that of my children.”

Inevitably, perception of effectiveness is part of the cost/benefit assessment made by those who have worked with a lawyer, in contrast to those who have not (above), and exemplified by the following statement: “I was dissatisfied that there wasn’t enough performance, and she was dissatisfied that there wasn’t enough money - so we split.”

These types of negative experience with costly professional services lead to a kind of fatalist despondency among some SRL’s, and provide them with a rationale for taking over their own case.
“I don’t mind lawyers being in charge but none of my lawyers ever had an action plan... Lawyers have poor organizational and customer skills and they charge ten times my hourly wage. Why would I pay (her lawyer) another $1,500 when she had no plan, no suggestions as to what would work? At this point I decided that I should represent myself.”

“After $12,000 I was still exactly where I started. I couldn’t keep on paying this kind of cost. It’s a big money grab. So I went back to representing myself”

The attitude of many SRL’s who described negative experiences with legal counsel was “how could it be any worse than this if I do this alone?” At least if they were representing themselves they would not be continuing to pay for a service that they believed was not advancing their interests. When asked “what difference would it make now to you to have a lawyer representing you?” some in this group expressed skepticism that it would in fact make any difference at all, once they had come this far on their own. Their belief was that the only difference between their position now as a SRL and their position if they had a lawyer still would be the amount of money they would have expended on legal costs.

c. A preference for handling the matter themselves

Around one in five SRL respondents expressed a personal determination to take their matter forward themselves, in addition to financial constraints that motivated them to self-represent. Typical of this view are sentiments such as “(I)t’s my story and no one knows it better than me – I lived it and breathed it” and “I wanted to be in control of my own destiny.”

A small number – around 10% of the SRL sample - expressed confidence from the outset that they could handle their case themselves and saw retaining legal counsel as a poor use of resources when relatively little money was at stake. This view was often associated with prior experiences that the individual believed equipped them well for tackling a court procedure. Sometimes this was direct experience with the legal system – for example as a para-legal or even a lawyer – as well as previous experience as a SRL.

94 There were four lawyer SRL’s in the sample
David felt “completely comfortable” with his decision to represent himself. He had had a number of previous experiences representing himself, and he had worked as a collections agent and as a bailiff. “It didn’t even cross my mind to have a lawyer represent me.”

He was encouraged to represent himself by the wealth of available resources, both online and in the law libraries. “You can fall over information just walking down the street in (his city).” In addition the staff at the courthouse were helpful and tried hard to help SRL’s. “In any case in my case (he was suing a landlord for the return of his deposit after a job offer fell through) I did not need much help or explanation as I was familiar with the process.”

In contrast to David, most of those who expressed a preference for handling their case themselves did not reach this conclusion immediately or even in the first few months or years of their experience. Many worked with legal counsel for some time before reaching the conclusion that they preferred to handle their case themselves. Many felt that they were not being listened to by their lawyer (above), and almost all also expressed concern about legal costs.

Despite these other elements, the sense that they were best placed to handle their own matter became an important element in their explanation of why they were self-representing. A common rationalization was that no lawyer could possibly understand the case, and what it meant to them, as well as they did themselves.

“I don’t regret not having a lawyer. This would introduce a new person who doesn’t know about our situation. Why have two people (lawyers on each side) who don’t know or understand them?”

There is an internal tension in some of these SRL narratives. The importance of staying in charge of one’s own case is genuinely important to many SRL’s, perhaps becoming more important as time goes by (in a sense it is the “silver lining” of handling the matter themselves). Yet these same respondents also describe the stress and anxiety they suffer as a consequence of representing themselves – including speculation about the disadvantage they are at when facing counsel on the other side - and many continue to make reference to the costs of legal representation.

97 Research on the impact of legal representation on outcomes is limited to date and the results inconsistent. See for example The Importance of Representation in Eviction Cases and Homelessness Prevention Boston Bar Association Task Force on the Right to Civil Counsel, 2012. For a review of current research, see Rhode D. “Access to Justice: An Agenda for
When asked, "would you like to have a lawyer now if you could afford one and assuming you could find someone competent?" some SRL’s say that they now find it difficult to imagine that these conditions could be met and are dismissive about the assistance of a lawyer (although note that many more said that they would welcome the assistance of a competent lawyer if they could afford one.) There is a feeling of defiance in some of these respondent interviews, with these SRL’s determined to manage without assistance now, despite the impact on their health and well-being.

5. How do SRL experiences match up to their expectations?

Some SRL’s began with a sense of confidence, which usually drained away quickly when faced with the reality of the court process, often triggered by difficulties completing application forms and understanding the service process. For those who began with fears about their ability to represent themselves, their story just got worse and worse.

a. First steps: initial confidence

Among some SRL’s, there was an initial sense of optimism that they would be able to handle representing themselves, and even, occasionally, a sense that it might be an interesting adventure. To the extent that SRL’s expressed confidence at the outset (17%) this was somewhat correlated with a higher educational level; the largest group expressing initial confidence had university degrees, and the second largest group had a college qualification.

Some rationalized their confidence on the basis of prior experiences (for example, as a workplace grievance officer, or as a para-legal that allowed them to feel some familiarity with the justice system. Others pointed out that they appreciated that getting into the business of self-representation would take a great deal of time, but that they had this time available to them: "I was retired so I had lots of time to learn this game."

Others talked about how they assumed that their education (especially those with university degrees) and their general life and work experience would enable them to undertake self-representation successfully

"I decided, 'I can do this. It will be a learning experience – but I am an intelligent person, I can figure this out.'"
When asked about what they typically observed as SRL expectations at the outset, service providers observed this same initial optimism among some SRL’s, describing it as an unrealistic assessment that they would be able to cope with the process. Some blamed the “overselling” of access to justice.

“I think they can do it because we claim this access to justice bullshit.”\textsuperscript{104}

Service providers describe SRL naivety in relation to both the complexity of the process, and the resources that the court could provide to assist them.

“It’s not a fast food service – (SRL’s) expect that they will make one or two court appearances. But in reality this will require multiple court attendances, summonses and a great deal of their time.”\textsuperscript{105}

Some SRL’s talked about being “seduced” by the mantra of “access to justice”, held out via public statements by the justice system. A similar point was widely made by service providers that “over-sell” of the access to justice theme created unrealistic expectations.

“People get information from the website and show up at court with expectations of “Access to Justice”. They imagine they will have everything done for them, including going into court.”\textsuperscript{106}

“I think they think they can do it because we claim this access to justice b.s.t.”\textsuperscript{107}

Their actual experience usually turned out quite differently (below). “No more fairy tale about having access to a justice system”\textsuperscript{108}. Even the few SRL’s who remained “on top” of their case had many critiques of the complexity of the process and the elusiveness of “access to justice”\textsuperscript{109}

Some service providers reflected on this issue of “over-sell” at a deeper level, describing what they understood as a fundamental disconnect between the expectations of the public and the reality of self representation which saw the justice system as a “service” facility, no different from other government offices. This lead them to expect that their own part would be relatively minimal – equivalent to applying for a passport or a vehicle licence – and that the court staff would take care of the rest for them. One duty counsel described this as follows:

\textsuperscript{104} ASP20
\textsuperscript{105} OSP16
\textsuperscript{106} ASP21
\textsuperscript{107} ASP14
\textsuperscript{108} ON18
\textsuperscript{109} BC30, ON54, JBC40
“They think of this as coming to get a service and a benefit... (they) believe that you go to courts to get justice services just like you to the motor vehicle office to get a license.”\textsuperscript{110}

b. First steps: initial fears

Some SRL’s told us that from the very beginning they were afraid of what they would face in representing themselves. As a result many of those who could not afford legal counsel, or had to end their relationship with counsel because they had run out of funds, expressed fears rather than confidence about representing themselves.

Janice\textsuperscript{111} is a single mother. Her toddler daughter’s father did not play a large role in their lives; Janice and her daughter had never lived with him. One day – “like a thunderbolt” – she was served with an application from him seeking joint custody.

A bitter court fight ensued “Once those papers were served, it was like a runaway train. There was no opportunity for us to talk reason.”

Janice was very fearful about what she was facing and retained a lawyer right away. After six weeks she had used up her $5000 retainer and had received a bill for a further $24,000. She borrowed money from her family and paid this bill “I desperately needed (her lawyer). She told me ‘if you represent yourself you will be eaten alive.’”

But now Janice was becoming equally scared about the prospect of what continuing legal work was going to cost her. She didn’t qualify for Legal Aid – she earned more than $75,000 – but could not afford to keep paying at this rate. And the process had scarcely begun – she had had just one hearing so far.

Before the next hearing, Janice reluctantly told her lawyer that she was going to have to represent herself. “This was a no choice situation: I just could not afford to pay anymore. I was really scared.”

Janice did eventually find a lawyer who would give her unbundled advice. She would see him every couple of weeks with a list of questions. Janice says that this was the only thing that got her through her nine-day trial.

\textsuperscript{110} ASP7
\textsuperscript{111} BC37
“I was preparing for it all summer (the trial took place in July). I stayed up until 3 or 4am most nights trying to put everything together.” None of her friends and family could be with her in the courtroom with her because they were witnesses. “No one could understand the fear that was in me and how hard the work was. I remember thinking to myself – do these people (the court clerks, the judge, the lawyer on the other side) imagine that I am enjoying this? I am here because I have no other option. I am just a mom, trying to figure this out... it was so complex, daunting, intimidating.”

Janice lost her trial.

Janice is not alone in starting with fears about the process. As one service provider put it, by the time that a SRL first presents themselves to the court, “their anxiety levels are already very high”\(^{112}\). SRL’s described their fears as follows:

“’I’m scared because I doubt myself and there is a lawyer sitting on the other side.’\(^{113}\)

“I felt scared – there was too much stuff to deal with. I’m really good if I can put a wrench on it, but I couldn’t put a wrench anywhere on this problem.”\(^{114}\)

Or simply

"I’m scared because I have no idea what to expect.”\(^{115}\)

c. Becoming overwhelmed

For a few SRL’s, their initial sense of confidence survived the bumps and bruises of the process, but they still had many critiques of the complexity and difficulty of the process, as well as they way they were treated by the courts. Two SRL’s who found their way successfully to the end of their process and appeared to have retained their sense of composure throughout nonetheless made the following comments:

“I expect to experience prejudice and discrimination as a SRL. But at my age, I’m damned if I am going to back off something that is reasonable and let the system add to the injury I have already received. (E)ven in small claims court, judges and lawyers regard SRL’s as a nuisance – they are no more welcome than they are in criminal court.”\(^{116}\)

\(^{112}\) ASP14
\(^{113}\) ON2
\(^{114}\) AB46
\(^{115}\) B31
\(^{116}\) ON54
“My biggest disappointment – and surprise – is the overwhelming amount of prejudice I have encountered. I have not been taken seriously by both lawyers and judges.”117

Only a small number of SRL’s spoke with any confidence about returning to the courts another time. The majority were, quite simply, overwhelmed. Some said that the process was nothing like what they had expected, and far more demanding of both their skills118 and their time (“all of which involved taking time off work.”119). Even those who began apprehensive told us that their experience turned out to be even worse than they had ever imagined.

“My expectations were that I would have to be sharp but I didn’t think that it would come down like a deck of cards. It’s an extremely sharp game. I had to begin to make my own filing systems – I became a bundle of nerves.”120

“The procedure as I read it sounded easy. I thought it as going to be easy - but it was anything but.”121

Four particular stages/ tasks within the legal process featured consistently in stories of feeling overwhelmed. These were: completing, filing and serving paperwork and forms; participating in the discovery process as a SRL (“I was eaten alive”122); and conducting one’s case at a hearing. Finally there were also many disappointed and frustrated expectations regarding the post-trial process, especially regarding collections. Many SRL’s assumed that having secured an order (this was particularly the case was the order was for the payment of monies) that the court would take responsibility for ensuring the money was paid. Instead, they were often appalled to learn that they now had to take further steps to collect the money themselves123. “What’s the point of the judge giving orders if no one is going to enforce them?” 124

Another frequently voiced complaint – and surprise - was about the length of time it took to complete each stage of the legal process. Few SRL’s had any idea of just how much time representing themselves would consume, or how long the process would take. To many, the legal process seems (and with unresolved issues, perhaps is) interminable. Many SRL’s expressed disbelief that the process could not be faster, or at least clearer guidelines provided to them about timelines. “It isn’t like this when you buy any other service.”125 There was little or no understanding that litigation moves at the pace of the slowest party.

Some service providers suggested that some SRL complaints about hearings go back to the erroneous belief that having filed an application, they would quickly be brought in front of a judge. But other SRL’s had researched and prepared carefully - and were still confounded by what happened when they got to court.

Mustafa became involved in legal action over the custody of his sister-in-law’s young children, after he and his wife learned that she was being assaulted by the children’s father. What began as a “good Samaritan” effort (Mustafa and his wife offered to take the children after CAS became involved) turned into a nightmare of litigation and self-representation.

By the time Mustafa was interviewed, he had appeared in court on his own behalf (they did not qualify for Legal Aid) on 14 occasions.

Mustafa tried to research what he needed to do to prepare for court but “(T)he typical procedure in court is not what the books describe—an opening, questioning, and closing. Instead it is just rambling on and on without a clear structure...I still was thinking the judge would ask for my information – I was ready to talk about case law and precedents. I thought the judge would read all the things you have to pay for (in advance), but in fact he doesn’t get (the file) until that day. How can you judge something you haven’t read? “

Mustafa reflects that he and his wife did the right thing and they have no regrets about that, but "(T)his is not what we expected when we first took this on"

This final quote in this section effectively summarizes both the substantive and emotional content of what many SRL’s said when asked about the relationship between their initial expectations of being a SRL, and their actual experience.

“My expectations? I can’t even remember my expectations anymore. My life just fell apart.”

The bottom line here is that most SRL’s simply have no idea what to expect, or that their expectations are inaccurate.

Part Three: Getting Started: How SRL’s Engage with the Justice System

6. SRL’s and court forms

a. Overview

A central component of courts administration strategy in dealing with the growth in the volume of SRL’s has to be provide an increasing amount of information – forms, procedural guides and other information – on-line. A review of publications and Internet reports on SRL resources reveals that the majority of resources being developed for SRL’s in both Canada and the United States are on-line.\(^{129}\) For this reason alone, an evaluation of this material deserves close attention in this Report. The experiences of SRL’s are often dominated by their experience with the user-friendly quality of these on-line resources.

All the SRL’s interviewed spoke about their experience with completing court forms, and often numerous subsequent procedural aspects of their case. In many cases, these process issues dominated their experience and thus the interview; in most interviews, the process dimensions of the SRL experience - both negative and positive, but often negative - were talked about a great deal more and at greater length than their outcomes. In the 25% of cases which were concluded by the time of the interview, it was evident that the procedural aspects of the experience - including the completion of court forms, which was often the first time a SRL realized the scale of the challenge they faced - were at least as important to the individual, as they recalled their experience, as the actual outcome.

This section (6) considers the information gathered by the study on the efficacy and accessibility of court forms, both on-line and hard copy. The next section (7) describes what SRL’s told us about their experience with other types of on-line resources, including court guides, legal overviews and primers, and other substantive resources - some of which are offered by the courts and some by other service providers.

In addition to questions asked in interviews and focus groups with SRL’s, two secondary projects were conducted to explore the accessibility of court forms and procedural guides. The first of these relates to court forms. The second relates to court guides (see (7)(c) below).

b. The Divorce Applications Project (Kyla Fair)

Kyla Fair is a research assistant to the SRL project who will graduate from the University of Windsor Faculty of Law in 2013.

\(^{129}\) See for example the programs reviewed in Innovations for Self-Represented Litigants Hough B. and Pamela Cardullo Ortiz P. (eds) Association of Family Conciliation Courts 2012
In the summer of 2012, Kyla – who had just taken Family Law and Civil Procedure at law school – was assigned to complete the forms to file for divorce in the three provinces in which we are interviewing self represented litigants (Alberta, BC and Ontario). She was asked to keep a log of her time spent and to record any other comments about her experience as she went through the relevant courts forms, which she could access on-line.

Kyla began her summer assignment with enthusiasm and confidence. She anticipated that this would be a relatively straightforward assignment, and expected to learn a great deal from the real-life experience of completing the court forms. In fact, she found the assignment extremely difficult and very frustrating.

i. Language and terminology

Kyla noted that a significant amount of the language and terminology in the forms was accessible to her only because she had taken Civil Procedure in law school. However there were still many examples in all the forms of terms and vocabulary that she did not recognize130. Kyla commented “I saw a number of terms that I did not understand, and many more that a person without legal training would have no idea what they meant.”

ii. Picking the “right” form(s)

Kyla’s second major observation was that in each province, the length and number of the forms quickly became overwhelming. “I was quickly losing track of all the forms I needed to fill out.” This challenge was exacerbated by the fact that it was sometimes difficult to know which form was the correct form to complete, with many possible choices. In one case Kyla described how she spent considerable time completing a British Columbia Supreme Court form which turned out to be only appropriate for an uncontested divorce.

“After reading through steps 1-5 for over 30 minutes, I have learned that this information package is only for an uncontested divorce ie. When you do not need to appear in front of a judge. This was frustrating because I wasted time reading a lot of information that does not apply to me, and I had already filled out forms that do not apply to me.”131

iii. Complexity of forms and information required

Kyla noted that all the forms she completed were complex and time-consuming – and singled out a few examples that were especially daunting, even for someone with legal training. For example, after spending 30 minutes attempting to fill out Ontario’s Form 13.1 (application for spousal support) “…I am completely overwhelmed; the amount of detail required about the value of everything you own/ all of your monthly/yearly expenses is 130 For example from the Alberta forms, “Praecipe to note in default”

131 Time log of Kyla Fair, July 2012 extreme. I am only about halfway through the form but I am ready to give up...(for example), I am required to provide a valuation of every item I owned on the date of my marriage, the valuation date... in reality, this form would take days to complete. At the end of the form, you are required to provide a complete calculation of net family property derived from all of the valuations previously entered. The math alone is complicated, and I feel as though many errors would be made without some legal assistance.”

iv. Commonplace and unhelpful notations

Kyla noted some particularly unhelpful notations which she found in virtually all the forms she worked with. For example, there was a frequent mention of “supporting documentation”, without explaining what type of documentation was needed (and what would be inadequate). Similarly there were frequent references to “service” and “serving” of documents, without any explanation for a lay-person about what this meant. Some forms did provide a link to another website where these terms would be explained.

Kyla made the further observation – heard independently from many SRL respondents in interviews - that each form included multiple references (sometimes on each page) to the need to retain a lawyer. While this is a perfectly reasonable suggestion – especially in light of the difficulties experienced by so many SRL’s with completing court forms and procedures – it is not terribly practical when the individual has no (further) resources for a lawyer, and does not qualify for Legal Aid. Some SRL’s complained that it was irritating rather than helpful to be constantly reminded in this way of a resource that they could not afford.

v. What happens next?

Kyla noted in relation to each form, from each province, that there was little or no information about the next steps in the process or what to expect. For example,

“I am not sure what court I am supposed to bring these forms to, or what the process is after I have filed the forms and served them ie. Does the court contact me? How long will it be until trial? What will the process be at trial? What documentation will I need to bring to trial? After trial, am I legally divorced? What happens if my husband contests the information I provided? Do I get copies of his statements before trial? ”

While it may be difficult for all this additional information to be contained in one place (eg on the court forms), it is important to note that without some guidance as to “next steps” many SRL’s are confused about what to do. Most will simply bring the forms back to the courthouse, where they once again wait in line and absorb a great deal of registry staff time.

133 For example, http://www.servicebc.gov.bc.ca/life_events/divorce/index.html
Kyla’s complete time log is contained below at Appendix H.

c. SRL experiences with court forms

Many SRL respondents described how difficult they found court forms to complete. The problem is exacerbated by the fact that, as one court clerk put it, “there a million forms out there.”135 Sometimes the clerk as well as the SRL is also seeing a particular form for the first time. As Crystal described,

“When I took the forms in to the court, the clerks told me that I had filled the forms in wrongly. I burst into tears. The journey from my home to the courthouse was a 150 mile drive and a ferry ride. In fact the forms were fine – the clerks did not actually know the procedure and it turned out the forms were OK.” 136

Crystal’s story was repeated in various ways over and over again by SRL respondents. It seemed that everyone had a story about a disaster (or multiple disasters) with completing and filing court forms, and many of these included a claim that they were given misinformation or information that they thought that they had followed, only to be corrected by another justice officer.

The most consistent complaints from SRL’s about court forms and guides were as follows.

i. Difficulty knowing which form(s) to use

Many SRL’s talked about the difficulty of ascertaining which court forms they needed to complete.

“I have the choice of three forms – but I don’t know which form I need? How would I know? It’s so overwhelming. Then you read the question and think, what does this mean? I would pay a lawyer to tell me what I need to do.”137

135 BSP21
136 BC53
137 ON49
Marie was sent forms to complete by her provincial support enforcement agency. She took three days off work to complete the forms (Marie is a university educated professional). However when she brought the forms into the agency, she was told that she had completed the wrong forms. Marie said “The agency is still giving these packages out to people – even though they are, in fact, the wrong forms.”

Like Marie, some SRL’s complained that they had expended substantial time completing forms that turned out to be irrelevant or inappropriate to their matter.

ii. Difficulty with language used on forms

Virtually every SRL in the sample complained that they found the language in the court forms confusing, complex and, and some cases, simply incomprehensible – referring to terms and concepts with which they were unfamiliar. This reaction was the same across all types of litigant no matter what court or province they filed in (although there were somewhat fewer complaints about small claims court forms and procedures, these were not devoid of criticism either).

In every case, significant time and effort is required to complete court forms. When Kyla Fair the project Research Assistant, was assigned to complete the forms to file for divorce in each province, she approached the task with her knowledge of family law and civil procedure. Nonetheless Kyla’s timelog reveals just how difficult the forms were to complete - frequently containing terms that even as an upper year law student, Kyla was unfamiliar with – and how long each step took her (see also above at (c)).

iii. Complaints about inconsistent information

While many SRL’s were appreciative of the assistance they were provided by court staff and especially counter staff at the court registry, a number complained that they were given contradictory information by different clerks.

“Two people look at your forms, one accepts it and one says this is wrong.”

One SRL said that she had got into the habit of leaving parts of her forms blank until she went to the counter, because of the likelihood if being told by the clerk she saw that day that her previous information had been incorrect. There were also complaints that information about completing court forms was sometimes inconsistent between

---

139 This was also a challenge for the Project Research Assistant Kyla Fair, see above at (c)
140 ON2
141 BC58
judges and court staff. This was a complaint echoed by court staff in interviews who told us that sometimes a SRL would come to the counter and ask for a form that “the judge said I should get” – but which did not exist. This further adds to the pressure that counter staff are experiencing, and sometimes results in expressions of frustration directed at them by SRL’s.

iv. Consequences of difficulties completing forms

When a form is incorrectly or inadequately completed, the consequences can be significant.

“The judge said that she saw no safety issues preventing me seeing my son – but that I had filed the wrong application. It should have been a application to vary, not an application for access. So she made no order. I lost not because of what I said about my son, but because of a technical thing about law.”

Some SRL’s tell stories of working on their papers, and then submitting what they had thought were the right documents, correctly completed, to the court – but when they took a day off work to appear at a hearing, being told that they could not be heard because their paperwork was incorrectly completed. Service providers note that this causes a great deal of aggravation and frustration, and suggests that a procedure for checking forms and alerting SRL’s to evident errors or omissions beforehand would save considerable judicial as well as SRL time. Along these lines, one court program is considering establishing a position of “SRL Navigator” in order to review forms with SRL’s and prepare them for next steps. A similar approach is taken by using a First Appearance Master at Jarvis Street where SRL’s appear before a special master who reviews their paperwork before their first OCJ appearance. “I don’t ready anyone for their appearance before me, I ready them for afterwards. I can also offer them more resources to help them self represent after their first appearance.”

The final story in this section comes from a university-educated SRL with a physical disability, who represented herself in (first instance) civil court because she could not afford to hire a lawyer.

“I have to say that as a person with a chronic illness it has been challenging to learn about court procedures and laws. I chose to represent myself because I am on a fixed income (disability) and can no longer afford counsel. I have spent all my life savings and more on a five-year divorce process...

The saddest part is that it is difficult to get accurate directions that allow me to get relevant information to help me make educated decisions. Forms are available online if you know which ones you need. Filling them in properly is another issue. I know I am not the only one feeling this way.”

\[148]\n
\[\text{d. Service providers comments on court forms}\]

It is not just SRL’s who are affected by the complexity of court forms. One veteran courthouse manager told us, “The forms are ridiculous. The lawyers can’t do it either. It creates more work for the counter staff. In Queens Bench it got so bad that we gave up using the four different forms and instead created our own single affidavit system.”

Moreover, court staff talked at length in interviews of the tension between the overwhelming difficulty some SRL’s had with completing the forms, and constraints on them assisting them to do so. Many court staff said that SRL’s often came in expecting that the counter staff would complete the forms for them, and were disappointed and sometimes angry when they discovered that this was not a part of their job. Some SRL’s appeared hopeless in the face of the requirement that they complete their own forms in order to file.

“I can see in their face that if I have given them information, but they still have to complete their forms, they are completely at a loss.”

Many counter staff at the court registries spoke about how upsetting it was to be constantly faced with SRL’s who were unable to complete their forms. They often feel very sympathetic towards them, but at the same time have clear instructions not to complete forms for litigants. Some counter staff told us that they wished that their job description could be changed to reflect the reality that many SRL’s needed more assistance with their forms. A few courthouses are experimenting with a station at the registry that offers assistance with form filling to SRL’s.

\[149\text{ON62}\]
\[149\text{AS2P0}\]
\[150\text{ASP15}\]
\[151\text{ASP7}\]
\[152\text{BSP1}\]
Working under their current constraints, however, is often stressful for counter staff. They are often looking at a long line stretching out behind a SRL who is begging them for help that they cannot give. One courthouse manager told a story of an effort she made personally to try to alleviate the difficulty for one elderly couple.

“I see the greatest problems for the older litigants – I think it’s generational...I also see all the time that the way that a self rep handles their preparation has a lot to do with their perception of the court and the justice system – so we have an interest in making that a positive experience, when we can. The other day, I was driving back to X from Y, and I stopped at Z to meet an elderly man who is representing himself in a dispute over a line fence. He said to me “I don’t even know if I will still be alive by the court date.” So I stopped at the side of the road and met him and his wife and helped them with the forms.”

7. On-line self-help resources for SRL’s

There is a huge amount of information available on the World Wide Web that is either designed for, or used by, SRL’s in preparing their case. Some of this takes the form of resources prepared by the courts as procedural guides for SRL’s (see (d) below). Some is provided by private law firms. Other websites are maintained by individuals and yet others are archives of specific resources, for example Canadian caselaw.

a. What on-line resources do SRL’s identify as most helpful?

Each SRL respondent was asked to identify any especially useful or helpful on-line resource that they used. By far the most frequently mentioned site by SRL’s in all three provinces was Can Lii. The next most frequently mentioned sites were all from British Columbia: they were the Justice Education Society of British Columbia’s video collection, the British Columbia Legal Services Society family law website, and JP Boyd’s family law website (a privately maintained website). In Alberta, a number of SRL’s said that they had found the Alberta Court Services (and especially Family Justice Services/Family Legal Information Centre) on-line resources to be very helpful. In Ontario, some respondents mentioned the Ministry of the Attorney General website, but not always positively (“adequate” was a typical description) and various private law firm sites that provide basic information.

Respondents found that these favorably mentioned websites were helpful, invaluable even, to them because they did not have the deficiencies and limitations described below.

b. Website deficiencies and limitations

The sheer volume of information available on the Internet is problematic. It is often difficult for SRL’s to know which site to use and how to move from one to another without finding apparent contradictions or gaps. Another problem is that it is clear from interviews that SRL’s ability to navigate and utilize information and forms provided on-line is affected by their emotional condition as they proceed through a contentious matter. In addition, a small number have no access to the Internet outside public facilities and/or are not comfortable using the Internet. This underscores the problem of over-reliance on on-line resources without also offering SRL’s face-to-face assistance and support.

In addition to these general themes, there were many detailed complaints about websites. SRL’s consistently complained that on-line resources:

(i) Emphasized substantive legal information but did not include information on practical tasks, for example how to serve a document, or presentation and procedure, for example how to present your case in court, how to address the judge, what to bring to court and how to prepare;160

“I have read many different family law books and have been on lots of family websites, but I am still not clear about the procedure. These resources don’t tell you how to write a motion, or the wording to use.”161

A related problem is understanding how to apply substantive information in the absence of FAQ’s or other question-and-answer formats which would anticipate common questions and misunderstandings from the perspective of a SRL.

(ii) Did not include strategic coaching and or advice on how to talk to the other side, how to approach settlement, and whether and how to use mediation;

(iii) Often directed users to other sites, giving rise to inconsistent information and difficulties navigating between sites;

“When you read information on the Internet and then it refers you to something else – which refers you to something else – by this time you are overwhelmed. It is endless mayhem.”162

“We need to develop a website to put all the resources into one place, one site. The information is too disparate.”163

160 The Justice Education Society of British Columbia’s website videos were the one resource that SRL’s mentioned that was helpful in this respect (procedural information and tips). (iv) URL links were frequently broken or not working (including on government sites);
(v) Generally, on-line resources often required some level of understanding and knowledge in order to be able to make best use of them.

“What about someone without my research capabilities? I did all this research and I still had just questions – it was scary.”

c. The Court Guides Assessment project

This project was conducted by Cynthia Eagan, an information technology specialist residing in Windsor, Ontario who works in the Detroit Public Library system. Cynthia contacted the Project after reading a local media article about the study in July 2012 and graciously offered her expertise and assistance on a voluntary basis. After a series of discussions, we decided that she could utilize her considerable experience with reviewing the accessibility of information as an information technology specialist to assist us in evaluating a selection of (on-line) procedural guides provided by the courts.

Together Cynthia and the Principal Investigator developed a template of questions that she would apply to a Court Guide from each provincial ministry. The questions used for Cynthia’s evaluation were:

1. Does the material use accessible and easily understood language?
2. Does the material avoid technical and legal jargon?
3. Is the use of language and terms consistent throughout the guide?
4. Do there seem to be any important unanswered questions?
5. Is there a reference point for further questions?
6. What is the material’s “reading level”?\(^{164}\)
7. What is the experience of navigating amongst URL’s cited in order to complete the form?

The three court guides that Cynthia evaluated using these criteria were:

---

\(^{164}\) For this assessment, Cynthia used the Flesch-Kincaid Grade Level test. This test rates text on a U.S. school grade level. For example, a score of 8.0 means that an eighth grader can understand the document. The formula for the Flesch-Kincaid Grade Level score is: \((0.39 \times ASL) + (11.8 \times ASW) - 15.59\) where: \(ASL = \text{average sentence length (the number of words divided by the number of sentences)}\) \(ASW = \text{average number of syllables per word (the number of syllables divided by the number of words)}\)

Cynthia’s assessment turned up many of the same issues that SRL’s complained (questions 1-3 above), Cynthia found many problems ranging from unclear grammatical expression through to numerous technical terms that are not explained (for example, “adult interdependent partner”165, “endorsement record” 166.

Cynthia’s assessment also turned up many “important unanswered questions” (question 4 above). On some occasions a description given in the Court Guide was too vague to be helpful to a lay-person (for example, “Remember that preparing for and attending at a chambers application will cost you time and money”. In other instances it was incomplete (for example, “You should request costs in the event that your application succeeds” but no information on how 167, or instruction to have a ‘sworn affidavit” without information on how to go about this process 168) begging the question of how a SRL would put this information into practice. Occasionally (but by no means always) a further reference point was provided (question 5 above), but in some cases these URL’s were broken or not working (question 7).

Cynthia found that the reading level of some of these on-line guides (question 6 above) varied widely and in the worst cases was probably set too high for some users. For example, she found that the reading level of an excerpt from the overview of the family law system provided by the Alberta courts169 is 13.6 (meaning that it could be only read and understood by a reader reading at a Grade 13 level); in the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney-General guide to serving documents it is 8.9170; and in British Columbia’s Guidebook for Representing Yourself in Supreme Court Civil Matters171 it is 5.1 (easily the most accessible on this measure).

Cynthia’s complete report (Report of the Court Guides Assessment Project) is contained below at Appendix I.

d. Conclusions

On-line information and resources for SRL's clearly have great potential as a means of delivering information. Creative use of on-line technologies including videos and interactive websites offer further promise.

However there are currently many deficiencies in the substantive quality of the material available to SRL's. Moreover on-line material is being developed in a piecemeal fashion – even within particular courts or ministries – and SRL’s complain that it is difficult to know just what to read and what to prioritize. There is duplication in some cases and important information missing – especially on “how to” and procedural matters – in others.\(^{172}\)

While doing everything we can to enhance the accessibility and utility of on-line information, it is important to recognize the limitations of even the very best of these resources. One SRL made the important observation that in order to operate competently in a new “culture” (ie the courts) she needed more than simply information.

“It’s the unspoken protocols that you can’t read about. These are the kinds of things that are so critical. If it’s not your culture, it can reflect badly on you.” \(^{173}\)

This type of orientation is not easily provided on-line. Instead, “I needed somewhere to go and ask questions – and she (an individual in court information service) answered them. She told me to go into the court and watch. I learned things like, the judge does not like to be interrupted, and when it was my turn to speak.”\(^{174}\)

Many other SRL’s expressed the need for more than on-line resources, however good – a need for human contact and support as they navigate the justice system and prepare their case to the best of their ability. This reality was continually recognized by service providers.

“You can set up all the websites you want, but often sitting face-to-face with someone is what people really need.” \(^{175}\)

8. Legal information for SRL’s

a. Overview

The most frequently accessed source of face-to-face “legal information” for SRL’s are the staff who work at the registry counters, and to a lesser extent (that is, more informally) the court clerks. In addition to these longstanding roles inside the courthouse positions, there are now a number of “non-lawyer” staff positions in in-court and community programs who interface continuously with SRL’s. These include Family Justice Services (offering and Justice Access Centres (offering both family and civil assistance) operated by the Ministry of Justice in British Columbia; Alberta Family Justice Services, which includes the Family Legal Information Centres, and Law Information Centres (providing advice on civil matters), all operated by Alberta Justice and staffed by the Alberta courts; and Pro Bono Ontario (operating Law Help Ontario), Family Legal Information Centres (operated by the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney-General) and Family Law Service Centres (operated by Legal Aid Ontario). In addition, some especially busy courthouses (for example, Brampton Ontario, Jarvis Street Ontario) operate a “triage” / information desk positioned immediately after entry security screening. One or more staff are located at this desk and deal all day with an endless line of confused and anxious people, acting as “traffic cops” who direct them to the right counter/ service.

Relative to other justice system actors such as lawyers and judges, all these positions are poorly remunerated and staff receive minimal training to prepare them to interface on a daily basis with SRL’s. The impact of the growth in numbers of SRL’s is having at least as significant an impact on the work of court and program staff as on members of the Bar and Bench. Day after day they are facing a deluge of anxious, upset and often increasingly frustrated people. Registry and program staff were eager to be interviewed by the Project – in part to describe the difficulties they faced, and in part, one felt, just to get a break from the stress and pressure of the counters for thirty or forty minutes. Interviews with registry staff in all three provinces exposed the pressure and stress of these positions; there was frequently a feeling of siege and even desperation in these interviews.

It was striking how directly the experiences and perspectives described by SRL’s and by registry and program staff in interviews and focus groups were mirror images of one another – for the SRL’s from one side of the counter, and for the registry staff/ legal information centre staff from the other. When asked to describe what they saw as the major frustrations of the SRL’s, counter staff were always able to accurately describe the same issues that SRL’s talked about, in particular difficulty completing court forms; false expectations that the counter staff could do more to assist them in this and other respects; bruising experiences with judges; and general despair over how to navigate the court process with so little knowledge and understanding. Their own frustrations stemmed from trying to do the best job they could to assist upset and anxious SRL’s who expected a great deal more from them than they could offer, both in terms of time and in relation to legal advice/ information.

Staff working at the registry and in other parts of the courthouse with SRL’s often experience an emotional toll that is also a mirror of the stress and upset experienced by some SRL’s. Many talked about taking work “home”, where they continued to worry about individuals whom they encountered in various stages of desperation. Some further complained that they receive insufficient support following particularly upsetting incidents.
“I had been working here for six months and a woman got dragged out by knifepoint by her husband. We got no debriefing or support. It was the most traumatic thing I've seen....The emotional baggage that they (SRL’s) come in with is only matched by our own”. (my italics)\(^\text{176}\)

Managers described in interviews how registry staff positions have historically been very stable, with many court workers serving for ten, twenty or even thirty years. Some of these long-term workers were interviewed by the Project (below). However managers also observed that these positions were becoming increasingly transitional as a result of the very high stress of the job. This means that it is commonplace for staff to be away on stress-related leaves, leaving the counters short-staffed. As staff turnover increases, courts and programs are constantly training new workers who inevitably begin with a more shallow knowledge than more experienced staff – and may then leave after a short time only to be replaced with others.

b.  The legal information/ legal advice distinction

At the heart of the job description for each “non-lawyer” staff person is the dubious distinction between “legal information” and “legal advice”. This constraint operates for registry staff and court clerks as well as for non-lawyer staff at a variety of court and community programs serving serve SRL’s (see above at (a)\(^\text{177}\)).

Many registry and program staff complained in interviews – some of them in dropped voices, aware that they were questioning an important orthodoxy of their role – that there was no clear or meaningful distinction between what they were allowed to dispense (“legal information”) and what they were not permitted to talk to SRL’s about (“legal advice:”). The SRL Survey conducted by Trevor Farrow et al for the Association of Canadian Court Administrators found that 55% of court workers found the distinction they were provided with between these two activities either inadequate or non-existent\(^\text{178}\).

Many court staff said in interviews that they felt hamstrung in their dealings with SRL’s at the registry counter and under pressure to refuse simple yet critical “advice”, for example about which form to complete or how to complete the form. Others complained that in the absence of clear directions that determined how much assistance of this type they should give SRL’s, they had little choice but to err on the side of withholding, especially given the volume of SRL’s standing in line each day. One family justice worker described this pressure as follows:

“Everyone’s kids are a priority to them, and they think that they should have special treatment. We understand, but they don’t realize that everyone else in line has kids

\(^\text{176}\) APS20

\(^\text{177}\) Note that this is not an exhaustive list but includes the most significant programs in the three provinces in terms of service provision

\(^\text{178}\) See Addressing the Needs of Self-Represented Litigants in the Canadian Justice System A White Paper prepared for the Association of Canadian Court Administrators Trevor Farrow et al 2010 too.” 179

If registry and program staff experience difficulty with the legal information/legal advice distinction, this is even less meaningful for SRL’s. Many are frustrated by what they see as the unwillingness of the counter staff to assist them – whereas the counter staff feels that to give further advice would go beyond their constraints imposed on them. One SRL who appreciated this tension described it as follows:

“I understand that the counter staff cannot give legal advice but most people do not. Instead, they think that what they are asking is a simple question and that the counter staff are just passing the buck.” 180

A further consequence of the ambiguity and uncertainty of the legal information/legal advice distinction is that in effect court staff are constantly exercising personal discretion in their dealings with SRL’s. 181 How much help should they give Mr A who is elderly and has already stood in line for an hour? How much should they say to Ms B who is confused about which forms she needs to complete and what information she needs to provide, and is having difficulty concentrating as she has a cranky two year old in tow? A constant problem is how far registry staff should go to review documentation before it is filed. If they do not, it may be rejected and the SRL will be back in line again in a few weeks time, more frustrated than ever. If they do, are they providing legal advice? And what about all the others in the line who want the same help?

A number of SRL’s pointed out that whether or not they reached someone who was willing to go a little further in assisting them was “…a matter of luck – whether you get a helpful person or not is a lottery” 182 Again, the comments of the registry staff themselves bear this out. Some SRL’s – usually those who can present themselves sympathetically, and may be higher functioning and with better social skills - will get more help and attention than others. This is borne out by the stories of SRL’s who managed to get a little extra help from counter staff by establishing personal relationships with them; for example presenting themselves as “a pleasant person” 183 in an effort to gain more help.

c. Interaction between SRL’s and court staff

When asked in interviews “who was the most helpful person you encountered as a SRL?” the majority of SRL’s described someone who worked at a courthouse registry, in a courthouse information program, or as a court clerk. While some SRL’s complained that staff were not sufficiently patient or friendly (below), the majority appear to understand the pressure that court staff are working under and appreciated their kindness.

“People working at the court counter are completely overwhelmed. At the beginning you think you have the right to help, and don’t understand why no one is offering it – but then you see how overwhelmed they are and understand how they could not possibly help everyone.”184

Some SRL’s talked about relationships they developed with particular staff who they came to rely on for help but also for moral support. One man described the counter staff at his courthouse as “the angels.”185, another woman as “the little fairies”186. A few SRL’s recognized that as they returned over and over, the patience and resources of the court staff to help them began to run out. Similarly courthouse staff talked in interviews about SRL’s who would come to the counter over and over and whom they began to wish to avoid.

Some SRL’s are also very aware that the people who help them the most are those on the lower end of the courthouse hierarchy.

“It is the grade 12 girls – the clerks – that really have the brains and the compassion to make things happen. They knew how to short cut certain things, and if they could see that you wee getting a dirty deal, they would sort it out for you.”

There were some noticeable differences between data collected that relates to registry staff (who may have begun their careers at a time when SRL’s were the exception rather than the rule), and staff working in court-based legal information program directed at helping SRL’s, such as the Justice Access Centres or the Family Legal Information Centres. Those in the latter group understand their job as helping SRL’s, and by and large accept the trials and stresses of the job. For example, “It can be very rewarding to help people. I...deal directly with people and although it’s always challenging, I am always learning new things. Most people are very happy when we help...It's like we are all at war together – it's tough, but we have fun.”187

Like this young woman, staff who have been hired specifically to work with SLR clients tend to be more engaged and willing to interact with this client group (compared to some staff who have worked at the registry counter for several decades and are now required to adjust their expectations). This relates to establishing clear expectations in a job description but may make an important difference to the quality of customer service. This difference was suggested by SRL comments about the assistance they received from legal information programs. SRL’s were for the most part very positive about these programs, and especially the JAC’s, FLIC’s and LinC’s. A few were frustrated by the constraints on how much assistance these programs could give them (the same tension around legal information/ legal advice described above) but most SRL’s appreciated the kindness and professionalism shown to them by the staff in these programs.

185 BC44
186 BC45
187 BSP14
Similarly, offices that have been designed to serve the SRL population tend to be differently laid out and organized than traditional courthouse facilities and may be more hospitable and practical for SRL’s. For example, the Vancouver Justice Access Centre has a check-in counter, but there is no glass between the client and the staff person, whose job is to refer each client to the appropriate resources / person within the Centre. There are two rooms containing computers and printers which can be used by SRL’s where professional staff circulate, offering assistance and answering questions. This set-up is both more conducive to SRL’s working for themselves and more welcoming in terms of offering help than a traditional line up in front of a desk.

There may be some generational differences in expectations that are reflected in different styles of dealing with SRL’s. One fascinating discussion among a group of courthouse and agency staff in a smaller centre illustrated this well. One older and senior agency staff (also a lawyer) suggested that SRL’s “should make affording a lawyer a priority. So maybe you have to sell your four wheeler?” A younger registry clerk shifted uncomfortably in her seat. “I couldn’t afford a lawyer. And I’m not sure you can tell people what to spend their money on.”

At the same time, many long-serving court staff have clearly adapted to the new SRL reality. Virtually all courthouse staff came across as compassionate and empathetic towards SRL’s in their interviews. What they are able to offer in practice, however, may vary from day to day and reflect both their workload and their personal stamina. A few SRL’s complained that the counter staff were only interested in helping “people in suits” (ie lawyers) and that they were treated without interest or compassion. There was a sense from some SRL’s that the counter staff were unwilling to try to understand their position.

“Some clerks, if you don’t phrase the question correctly, they will not rephrase it to help you out.”

One SRL proposed that the counter staff “should be like crossing guards and be helping us cross the street.” Some accept this role, while others may be less willing to do so. One SRL who effectively summed up what many SRL’s say they are really looking for from courthouse staff, whether or not this includes “legal advice” or “legal information”.

“More kindness is needed in the system. Its OK to give guidance, and not all guidance is legal advice.”
d. Other stresses for court staff

Court staff frequently complained about the difficulty of keeping up with the ever-changing law and procedure in their area, and especially in family law. These personnel are required to be familiar with an enormous amount of information, with little formal training and supervision. It is hardly surprising that SRL’s complain that they are sometimes given inconsistent information by different counter staff, as well as inconsistent information between a judge or master and the counter staff.

9. Other resources for SRL’s

a. Mediation services

Court-based mediation services are also seeing increasing numbers of SRL’s. One mediation program manager commented that she was seeing more and more clients who did not have lawyers, and that the primary factor was “...legal costs. They say that fees are astronomical and by the time they are through with legal costs, there are not many assets left....(and) more recently there is this huge mistrust of lawyers, because they’ve spoken with people with bad experiences or have themselves have had a previous bad experience.”

Many service providers talked about the value of offering mediation once legal action begins. There was a widespread sense that mediation was often very effective, but that there was still limited knowledge among SRL’s about how they might use mediation: “some are not open to mediation because they ...don’t understand the purpose of know that it may help – people don’t realise what mediators actually do.” This means that cases that could be settled tend to get “stuck” in the system because the SRL does not have the skills and tools to effect a settlement (see also below). A master at a busy urban courthouse pointed out,

“If people could afford a lawyer, the lawyer could work out a consent for them so two weeks later they aren’t back in court again – but they don’t know how to do this and just keep coming back over and over again.”

Among some SRL’s there is a sense that mediation is more intimidating than going to court – “they are mistrustful of the mediation process.” “It’s human nature to want to avoid confrontation and it seems easier to go to court.”

All SRL’s were asked in interviews whether they had either considered or had been offered a chance to mediate. Many said that they did not know about mediation, and/or said that it had not been offered to them. From field trips to courthouses it was evident that there is an uneven provision of on-site mediation services, with larger centres such as Jarvis and Sheppard offering mediation services all day, five days a week, and other more rural centres such as Wetaskiwin only able to offer mediation on one day a week.

Even among those who were aware of mediation and in some cases eager to use this as a possible means of resolution, many problems were noted. Most frequently SRL’s said that they wanted to try mediation but the other side would not co-operate. This is a familiar refrain in other mediation studies and of course cannot be objectively verified. What is clear is that “Mediation means nothing if the other person doesn’t want to mediate or is not willing to settle.”199

Other comments by SRL’s about mediation that came up fairly consistently suggest different challenges. A number described what they saw as a culture of opposition to mediation among the legal profession, either discouraged from mediation by their own lawyer or rebuffed by the lawyer on the other side. Some complained that even when they asked about mediation, their legal counsel (if they were represented at the time) or counsel on the other side did not take it seriously. Some complained that mediation was simply used as an opportunity to stall by experienced parties200 or counsel201. Even when mediation did take place, in some cases the parties did not participate, as this woman describes:

“The lawyers are making a farce out of mediation….The present mediation system does not work. Lawyers are treating it as a silly game and thinking of ways to beat the system. They are making a mockery of what should have been a good solution. Litigation lawyers do not want it to work ...What is the advantage to them?... I think if I had been allowed in the mediation I would have been able to settle at that time.”202

Others complained that mediation was costly (several SRL’s203 spent a significant amount on mediation but the case did not settle – obviously this is always a risk) and some had specific complaints about mediator competency. A few made the perennial complaint that mediation agreements “had no teeth” and that the other side was able to default without consequence204. The overall sense of all comments made about mediation programs and the work of mediators is that these services are still not offered at a consistently professional and credible level, and are only just beginning to gain public trust.

A few SRL’s spoke about how helpful they found mediation to be. One businessman who used mediation to resolve his case commented

“(T)his is my second experience with mandatory mediation, and in each case the process was very fair. The ability to be heard without restrictions is so helpful, and healing. The positive outcomes for my side are a bonus.”

A larger number of SRL’s who had not been able to use mediation – because the other side refused or because they were not offered mediation – spoke about their belief that mediation should be mandatory – in order to bring the other side to the table and at least try to settle – or at least pressed much harder by judges and court staff. The sentiment expressed by this frustrated SRL was reiterated by others:

“Mediation needs to be pushed by the court. Give me a good reason why you can’t do mediation. Domestic violence? Do shuttle mediation. You are wasting the court’s time, (and that means) taxpayers dollars.”

These comments suggested a future in which mediation would be normative and even assumed. As one SRL who had had a number of experiences in the courts for small claims matters over several decades put it, “ (Mediation is) a star glowing on the horizon - but it never gets any closer.”

Obviously mediation will not resolve all matters, but many SRL’s were of the view that at least it would be tried. Many also understood that this will take a stronger push from the court services and the Bench. With increasing recourse, one might also expect the standard of professional services to rise.

b. Community-based support for SRL’s

This study engaged some of the community agencies that operate in the locale of the courthouse sites, among them advocacy centres for both men and women (including domestic violence programs and men’s groups), Native Friendship Centres, the Elizabeth Fry Society, and public libraries. The support of domestic violence support groups was especially critical to some female SRL respondents, and a few male SRL’s spoke about the importance of the support provided by a men’s group. We also interviewed staff at some unique agencies offering resources to SRL’s such as the Justice Education Society of British Columbia, and others that did not have a brief for assisting SRL’s but nonetheless frequently encountered clients who were pursing legal action without representation (usually family matters), foe example Prince George Action Against Poverty, Nanaimo Citizen Advocacy, Peel Poverty Action Group. The project materials were distributed to many of these agencies, and some interviews conducted with staff.

Every individual interviewed from a community agency attested to the rapid growth in the numbers of SRL's they were seeing, and the “downloading” of some areas formerly served by public legal services to their agencies. One domestic violence worker described how they had formerly referred women to Legal Aid lawyers, but as the program was cut, so her role changed.

“Our previous role was supportive – to go with women clients to see their lawyers. Now women don’t get lawyers – now we are the "lawyers"!”

While welcoming the introduction of “legal advocate” (advocates who accompany women to court, not qualified lawyers) programs for women who suffer domestic violence, another domestic violence worker emphasized the need for women facing abusive partners to have legal representation.

“They need lawyers. Everyone in family court does but domestic violence victims absolutely need lawyers. They need a family court process that understands that their situation is not the same as those who have not experienced domestic violence.”

As the numbers of SRL’s continue to rise, we may see some community agencies starting to develop new resources to assist this population. In addition, public libraries are frequently used by SRL’s and anecdotally librarians report many more queries related to legal procedures. Future research could consider ways in which the library system might meet some SRL needs, for example by providing Internet access to on-line resources, specialist librarians, and access to other “office” facilities such as printing and photocopying.

c. Access to law libraries

A significant group of SRL respondents used their local law library for research. Several singled out the law librarian for especial praise. Some SRL’s clearly became regulars at their local law library.

A law librarian who contacted the Project asking to be interviewed had some interesting observations about the SRL’s whom he regularly assists at his court library.

“The ones that come to the library and make an attempt (to research) - they clearly have some sense that there is a gap in their knowledge and they are there because they recognize they need help..... Money is far and away the primary motivation.”

self-represent). From what I see, only a small fraction of SRL’s think that they are smarter than the lawyers, or think they don’t need a lawyer, or have an ideological axe to grind that a lawyer may not buy into....(the rest) are so desperate for assistance that they trust their fate to a stranger (ie a law librarian) who they think will help them.”

d. Support person

All SRL’s were asked if they customarily took a support person with them when they went to the courthouse, either for an appearance or to file documents or any other appointment (for example at a help service). We were interested to know how often a family member or a friend who was there for emotional or psychological support rather than to offer expert advice was a part of process. An anecdotal observation from spending time in the courthouses was that there were many people in the hallways and waiting rooms who were not litigants themselves, but were there to give support to litigants. Whereas friends and supporters might also attend a hearing where a person is represented by legal counsel, the role of a friend for a SRL is somewhat different and may present different needs and challenges for court services staff. We were curious about the role played by the “friends of the SRL’s”.

Only 37% of SRL’s reported that they regularly took a support person with them to court. This was sometimes a friend, sometimes a family member, or sometimes members of a wider support group (for example, a father’s rights group, or a women’s support group). One SRL said that she took along a friend “who dresses and looks like a lawyer.”

Many other SRL’s said that they had initially taken along a family member or a friend, but the process was taking so much time and was so stressful that they felt that they could not keep on asking for this type of time and support. Several commented that the only person who could possibly have the time to attend all the hearings with them would be someone who was retired or unemployed. Among the 55% who answered “no” therefore were a significant number who had previously had a support person accompany them, but no longer had this resource. Instead, they made do with a sense of solidarity with the SRL’s around them: “The other people in the line – they are your buddies.” Interviews with court staff confirmed that many informal friendships get struck up among SRL’s as they wait in line or for a hearing.

Where they did have a dedicated support person with them, SRL’s reported the assistance in a variety of ways, including helping them to figure out forms and procedures, keeping them company, helping them to stay calm and focused, having another person listen to instructions to ensure that they got them right, or assisting them with language issues. One described the benefit of having friends or family in the hearing room: "You need someone in the crowd to focus on."

For the court staff on the other side of the counter, or the clerk in the hearing room, the presence of a support person can be both positive and negative. Some counter staff commented that it can be difficult to deal with two people at once, especially when the support person “wants to do all the talking”. As another put it, “some of them want to be lawyers” and “you find that you can't get a word in edgewise – people bring their moms, their new girlfriends, their cousins etc.” Where the support person is “egging them on” this can be a problem – but in most cases, court staff and service providers see the presence of a support person is a positive development. The SRL “buddy” usually has the “cooler head” and their primary role is to keep the SRL calm and centred.

The next most common function for a support person is to provide translation services for SRL’s whose English (or French) is weak. In the absence of clear rules and parameters for the intervention of a support person, especially in initial interviews with duty counsel or in hearings, there is a sense that a person whose role is to translate will generally be allowed more latitude and greater access. A few service providers told us that unless the buddy is there to provide language assistance they will generally not allow a support person to accompany a SRL into an interview.

A few SRL’s described the benefit to them of bringing along a friend or family member who has had some legal training:

“My friend is my “technician” who makes sure that my paperwork is “spot on” – I could not have done this without him.”

“I did the desk order with my dad, who is a lawyer – this saved me $20,000. I did all the research and made the major decisions about what would be included in my affidavit and what was the right thing to do. I was very privileged...how people do this without money or resources I do not know...it would have made me sick from the very beginning.”

A small number of SRL’s reported that they brought their support person into a hearing with them in order to act as a “McKenzie friend”? There was some confusion about the role and limits of the input of a McKenzie friend (for example, most judges will not allow them to speak in court but they may whisper advice and provide moral support). A discussion on the Facebook page in February 2013 illustrated the lack of widespread knowledge about the concept and the confusion over what they could and could not do. Some SRL’s reported in interviews that they asked for a friend to be able to sit at the front table at their hearing but were told that their friend must instead sit at the back of the courtroom.

“I tried to go into help my friend who’s case I have been helping her with and I wasn’t allowed to sit beside her in court or help her find something. If an attorney can have their assistant help them find something, why can’t a self rep have someone beside them to assist with the paperwork or to take notes?”

It may be very helpful for court services and service provider staff to contemplate a more complete research study aimed at collecting more data about the role of support persons, and how they might be educated to be constructive in the process. The relationship between a “friend” or support person and a McKenzie friend also requires clarification.

e. What other resources are SRL’s asking for?

i. SRL orientation and education

Some SRL’s expressed an interest in receiving earlier orientation that would enable them to better anticipate what lay ahead of them.

“The ... government... should hold a no fee group information session (for SRL’s) – talking about forms needed, time limits, what evidence is, etc. This would be an opportunity to learn about the system.”.

These suggestions consistently emphasized orientation to the procedural and even cultural aspects of self-representation (for example, how to behave, what to wear, what to expect) rather than substantive learning “about” law. Others suggested workshops that helped family SRL’s to prepare a parenting plan, or a budget, a proposal for creating child

230 A McKenzie friend is a lay person who stands with a person who is otherwise unrepresented and assists them in court. The expression derived from the English case of McKenzie v McKenzie (1970) 3 All ER 1340. The original McKenzie friend was an Australian barrister who was not entitled to practice in the English courts. The principle has developed into a general right of assistance for SRL’s but substantial discretion is exercised by individual judges. support, or a proposal on property distribution, that would be offered by financial planners, psychologists and other appropriate professionals rather than by lawyers.

This type of early orientation could provide some “realty-checking” before individuals begin to self-represent.

“We have marriage courses, pre-planning for funerals but no one knows what will happen when you go into the courts. If they did know, they may not choose to go though it.”

Even where they have no choice but to continue to self-represent, early orientation and information would at least allow them to begin the process with more and better information than they have at present (SRL’s frequently told us that they really had no idea what to expect).

“We need more services to prime or prepare you, before you dive in to the court process.”

One speculated that SRL orientation might save the system time and money.

“If resources were redistributed to SRL education and support in the beginning then you would spend less money later. This would make a difference to the entire process.”

A Facebook discussion on the idea of an orientation program drew many favorable comments but some resistance to the idea that it should be mandatory.

ii. Office facilities

Some SRL’s describe struggles with accessing computers and more describe not having access to a printer or a photocopier. Office facilities inside the courthouse that would enable SRL’s, perhaps at cost, to access the Internet, print out documents, make copies etc would be extremely useful and would reduce the stress of trying to independently utilise commercial facilities outside the courthouse.

iii. Coaching/ mentoring

Another type of assistance described by some SRL’s emphasized one-on-one contact but was focused less on legal advice or even information, and more on “coaching” ie helping them to make their own decisions about procedure and strategy, review of their work to date. For example, “person to person assistance with walking through my paperwork” and checks on “my lawyer homework”\textsuperscript{240}. The important distinction here from a traditional advisor is that this person would “coach me to do it myself. Someone ...who knows what questions I should expect, who can give really practical advice on what to say and what not to say...”\textsuperscript{241}

A similar idea - of assistance provided by a person who is not a lawyer and does not take control of the case, but instead guides and supports the SRL - is described by some SRL respondents as “mentoring”.

“There should be a mentor program available, not so much for the legal expertise, but more of a hand to guide you on the path through the process.” \textsuperscript{242}

A related idea described by other respondents would be for SRL’s (at their request) to be assigned a “buddy” offering moral support rather than advice or information, for example accompanying them into the courtroom for a hearing. Some SRL’s bring supporters or friends with them to court (see above at XXX) and others meet and make friends in the registry line-up. A more formalized protocol for including friends or assigning a volunteer SRL “buddy” – perhaps using the model of victims services – would add value for some SRL’s and would enable consistent expectations and practice (a problem in some courthouses).

Part 4: SRL’s, Lawyers and Judges

10. Delivering legal services to SRL’s

    a. SRL recourse to legal services

    More than half the respondents in the SRL sample (53%) had a lawyer who acted for them at an earlier stage in their case. One quarter of these were Legal Aid clients. Private clients typically ran out of funds to continue to retain their counsel, and Legal Aid clients had reached the end of their Legal Aid entitlement and/or their financial circumstances had now changed and they could no longer access Legal Aid.

    In a small number of cases where they were privately represented, SRL’s continued to refer to this counsel for occasional advice as they proceeded on their own. Most of these previously represented individuals sought free legal advice in some form once they became SRL’s (64%) although 35% said that they did not (some of these may have been using private “unbundling” instead, below). The reason most commonly given for not seeking \textit{pro bono} legal services was that the respondent assumed that they would not be eligible. Some SRL’s expressed embarrassment at the idea of applying, and then being rejected for, free legal assistance.

\textsuperscript{240}ON2
\textsuperscript{241}BC50
\textsuperscript{242}BC44
While 37% of the whole sample did not retain counsel at any stage in this matter (primarily because of the cost; see back at (4)) many of these individuals sought legal advice in a variety of ways. Some tried (for the most part unsuccessfully in the absence of a prior relationship) to persuade a private lawyer to give them “unbundled” advice. 60% of this group sought free legal advice via in-court programming, duty counsel or some other agency. Again, among those who did not seek free legal assistance the most common reason was an assumption that they would not qualify.

This data establishes that most respondents (86% of the sample) attempted to access legal advice services in some form, depending on their means. 53% had counsel representing them at some stage; a further 33% sought pro bono assistance. Those who neither retained a lawyer to represent them at any stage in their case (usually for financial reasons) nor sought free legal advice (usually because of concerns over eligibility) – represented just 14% of the sample.

A closer examination of the 33 files that comprise this 14% is very revealing. Virtually every respondent in this group said that the reason they did not have a lawyer was because of financial restrictions. Of the 33, about one in five added that the amount at stake in their case made it appear not worthwhile to hire counsel and have to pay them out of anything they won. A further one in five added that could not find a lawyer to represent them with whom they felt comfortable (having tried to find a lawyer at an earlier stage) and/or preferred to handle the matter themselves.

Just one in five of this group (n=7) voiced a specific criticism of lawyers as factoring into their economic decision to self-represent (most commonly concerns about not knowing what they would have to pay/ lawyers “overcharging”; and concerns about lawyers being ineffectual around settlement and raising the “ante”; for example, “having lawyers involved in cases escalates the matter and is detrimental”243.)

This data shows that at the beginning of their SRL experience, most respondents were either positive or neutral towards the idea of lawyers acting for them. They were acting alone not because they disliked lawyers or rejected the idea of legal advice services, but for practical reasons – they could not afford to retain or continue to retain counsel. Many in this group then sought pro bono legal advice services, unless they believed that they did not qualify for such assistance.

SRL attitudes towards lawyers and legal services may change during the course of their SRL experience. When asked in interviews what they would ask a lawyer to do for them now, assuming that an affordable and competent counsel could be provided to them, some SRL’s said that they would no longer be interested in working with a lawyer – usually reflecting a combination of a bad prior experience, and their own determination now to manage their case themselves.

Many more SRL respondents responded by talking about the ways in which a lawyer could help them. They stated that they would have preferred to be (or continued to be) represented by counsel.

“Oh my goodness yes, in a heartbeat.” 244

In summary, a majority of the SRL sample would have preferred to have legal representation, if they found this affordable, offered them tangible value-for-money as they understood this (ie offered them expertise which they lacked and which brought the prospect of a better outcome), and would allow them to remain in control of major decisions about the direction and conclusion of their case. Unfortunately, a smaller but significant group simply did not believe that these criteria would or could be met in legal representation.

b. Legal Aid

13% of the SRL sample (and one quarter of the 53% of the sample who said that they had previously retained counsel in this matter) said that their prior representation had been via Legal Aid. Their access to Legal Aid had been discontinued or had run out, and these individuals were now representing themselves. Typically they had been legally aided for their original divorce application, but were unable to receive public assistance for a subsequent variation245, or their financial circumstances changed (for example they began to receive support, or went back to work) and they no longer qualified for Legal Aid246.

A number of other SRL’s in the sample (principally in family cases) described applying for Legal Aid but being refused because they owned a home, received a pension, or a disability benefit. Unsurprisingly, many in this group were dissatisfied with the criteria applied to them that excluded them from the provision of Legal Aid.

While some were very happy with their Legal Aid lawyer, and regretted very much that they no longer qualified for representation, a significant group expressed dissatisfaction with quality of legal services they had received from their Legal Aid lawyer. Some said that their assigned lawyer was not sufficiently experienced or knowledgeable in

245 For example, the website of the British Columbia Legal Services Society makes it clear that in most cases, an individual will only qualify for legal representation for a serious family matter once. It also appears that a variation that is not based on a serious situation involving a child would not be covered by legal representation, but rather legal advice. www.lss.ca
246 Financial eligibility for legal aid advice and representation is set at under $2060 monthly income for a family of four in Ontario; $3340 for a family of four in Alberta; and $3230 for a family of four in British Columbia. All figures current from the 2012 websites of the Legal Aid Societies (www.lss.ca; www.legalaid.on.ca; www.legalaid.ab.ca)
the area of law required for their case. A few stated their belief that Legal Aid lawyers were generally of a lower quality than other private lawyers. The most frequent complaint was similar to the complaint made about private lawyers – that the lawyer was unresponsive, did not seem to care about their care, and did not “do” much.

An obviously highly intelligent young woman, Frances was perplexed by the difficulty she had in establishing any real communication with her lawyer.

Frances was relieved when she was told that she qualified for Legal Aid in order apply for full custody of her two young children from a common law relationship. The relationship had been abusive and she was concerned about sharing custody with her ex. She wanted to have a woman lawyer represent her, and picked a name from the list provided by Legal Aid.

However Frances found that her lawyer “really did not communicate with me, and I could not see what she was actually doing.”. She wanted to know more about what was happening in her case, but instead found herself “shut out” from any information. “My lawyer just seemed really withdrawn from me. So I asked her “Do you want this case? If not, maybe I should find another lawyer.”

The lawyer responded that Frances’ case was very demanding and required a lot of attention. Frances didn’t understand – she could not see what attention the lawyer was giving her case.

As the case progressed, Frances increasingly felt that she and her lawyer were not on the same page. Her lawyer told Frances that she should not be asking for sole custody - “you will lose” - but did not give her a clear explanation. In the end, Frances walked away from her Legal Aid lawyer and represented herself. ’I wanted to be in charge of her case so that I, and not my lawyer, could decide what was right.” She said “Even if I was offered another Legal Aid lawyer now, I would try this on my own – I want to be in control of this. I am not confident – but I am determined.”

Some of these dissatisfied individuals said that they were no longer interested in working with a lawyer after their Legal Aid ran out, and that they had “lost faith in the legal system and lawyers.” Others went to a private lawyer when their Legal Aid ran out, before expending all their available resources and becoming self-represented.

c. Duty counsel and summary advice services

During the time we spent in the courthouses during this project we met a number of duty counsel, and conducted formal interviews (usually by follow up phone call) with five. Much of the time duty counsel was simply too busy to speak with us at length. We also met and interviewed twelve personnel from in-court service providers250 who offered summary advice services, usually a pre-booked appointment with a volunteer lawyer. Finally we conducted interviews with a further ten individuals who worked for outside programs that offered a summary advice model. Many of the comments made by SRL’s about their experience with these forms of assistance – duty counsel and free summary advice inside or outside the courthouse – are relevant to assessing the future efficacy of these types of legal services, and so they have been combined below.

By far the most common model for delivering legal advice services to SRL’s is a summary advice model, where a lawyer will spend a limited time (usually 30 minutes) one-on-one with a SRL providing guidance on how to progress their case. Most of these programs are by appointment only, and many will only permit one session (although some SRL’s told us that they persuaded services to bend this rule). Some of these programs operate inside the courthouse (for example Pro Bono Ontario is located in some Ontario courthouses, and the Justice Access Centres that operate in some British Columbia courthouses). Other programs offering similar services are located outside the courthouse (such as Pro Bono Alberta, the Legal Guidance clinics in Alberta and community legal clinics in Ontario).

The most common “walk-in” summary advice model is family duty counsel, staffed by provincial Legal Aid lawyers and offered in most family courts, (although not on a daily basis in smaller courthouses; for example, family duty counsel is available just once a week in Wetaskiwin, Alberta).

33% of the SRL sample used of pro bono legal services, most of them (27%) by accessing duty counsel in the courthouse. A small number of respondents said that they had been told that they did not qualify for free advice from duty counsel because of their income level, although others told us that duty counsel was persuaded to talk to them in any case251. In two instances, a SRL said that they could not use duty counsel in their courthouse because the other side (their ex in a divorce case) had already used the same duty counsel252. This is likely to become an increasing problem as the proportion of SRL’s in family court increases.

Some of those using duty counsel also used other pro bono services via in-court programming or in the local community. A further 6% described using these services but

---

250 For example, the Family Legal Information Centres / Law Information Centres in Alberta, Pro Bono Ontario in Ontario and the Justice Access Centres and Family Justice Services in British Columbia

251 For example, BC38

252 ON32 and BC44
not duty counsel. These programs included university law school clinics and a variety of community legal guidance clinics. In Ontario, a few respondents had used the Lawyer Referral Service (now the Law Society Referral Service) to obtain a free half hour summary advice session. In-court programs – for example Pro Bon Ontario, the Family Law Information Centres in Alberta, or the Justice Access Centres in British Columbia - appeared to be more widely used by respondents than community based services (instead those described by SRL respondents were more typically domestic violence support services for women or men's support and advocacy groups (see below at (9)) rather than legal advice resources).

d. SRL evaluation of the summary advice model

Many SRL’s had positive comments about duty counsel and their willingness to assist them in a time of stress and anxiety. Some individuals working in these positions are clearly very dedicated and their clients sense that commitment to them\(^{253}\). This SRL explained how duty counsel helped her. Interestingly, she frames this as a coaching experience for her, rather than duty counsel telling her what to do:

“I went to duty counsel to try to present my case so I could properly follow procedure to try to get things settled. Talking with duty counsel helped me confirm that I was understanding what was going on. I have no previous knowledge of the procedure or the language. …The duty counsel was the best resource in helping me to know that I was doing this right.”\(^{254}\)

This positive view was not shared by all respondents. Some SRL’s were evidently able to make much better use of limited advice sessions than others. Those respondents who were most satisfied with the value they got from the summary advice model spoke about preparing their questions in advance, anticipating additional information that they needed; being ready for the fact that duty counsel/pro bono counsel would have limited time available for them; and going in for the meeting “with a resolution agenda, not an emotional agenda.”\(^{255}\)

Among those who seemed pleased with the assistance they received from duty counsel/ a limited time advice session with pro bono counsel were a number who made the important point that individuals with mental health issues and/or poor cognitive abilities would have great difficulty absorbing all the information that they would receive in a summary advice session\(^{256}\). They would likely also have difficulty planning how to use the session effectively to answer their questions.

Indeed, other SRL’s the sample spoke about feeling “overwhelmed”\(^{257}\) and confused"\(^{258}\)” after talking with duty/pro bono counsel. These same respondents were

\(^{253}\) For example, ON49, BC56
\(^{254}\) BC27
\(^{255}\) BC23
\(^{256}\) BC69
\(^{257}\) BC69
also more likely to complain about feeling rushed (“if you get ten seconds than you are lucky.”) and generally feeling poorly served. Some SRL’s told us that they would often think of a pertinent question only after their session is over, and feel exasperated about how long it would take them to be able to get another appointment. This dynamic is corroborated by agency staff. “They call and say, I have just have one question and want an answer and don’t want to make an appointment for just one question.”

Another factor in the usefulness of summary advice is the timing of the meeting in relation to key SRL tasks and actions. A number of SRL’s described experiences in which they discovered mistakes only after they had completed and submitted court forms, or made assumptions about making their case which they were now told were erroneous. Earlier assistance would have enabled them to complete forms accurately, and/or reassess their evidence and arguments, saving both the SRL and the court considerable time and energy.

A discouraging number of SRL’s complained that they believed that lawyers working in public legal services, either as volunteers or employees, were of a poorer quality than those in the private bar. Similar comments were made about lawyers assigned to respondents by Legal Aid. Some SRL’s understand that these positions are not well compensated and they appear to believe that this affects the quality of counsel available to them via publicly funded services. This may be a very unfair criticism but it is reported here because it was made by a significant number of SRL’s.

“Duty counsel – I think they are punished by being there...the service they provide is dismal at best, confusing at worst, really no use at all.”

“Duty counsel was rude and abrasive to me. (C)ourt services provide very little service...what is deemed a service in the courthouse is very far from it in my opinion.”

While these comments may be unfair given the stress that duty counsel and pro bono lawyers often work under, it is also the case that many in this group are relatively junior lawyers gaining experience – and managing a 30 minute interview with an anxious and often emotional SRL is a challenging task for even the most experienced lawyer.

Even SRL’s who had good experiences with duty counsel often made the point that their services were too limited to be really helpful to them. For example, the high demand for duty counsel services means that in some courthouses, duty counsel will not appear with a SRL in court but provide advice before only. Others complained that duty counsel

259 AB7
260 BSP15
261 This may not require a qualified lawyer: “There should be someone to review the paperwork and say “we need a, b and c. You don’t need a lawyer but the courthouse needs someone to review the documents – it could be relatively simple – yet there is no one there to say “this is complete” or not.” ON38
262 ON27
could only see them on the day of their appearance and they needed more assistance to prepare beforehand\textsuperscript{264}. Others commented that duty counsel in their courthouse only provided one session and could not help them if they came back on another day. Some were upset that when they returned for more help duty counsel was less helpful than the first time. "Initially duty counsel very sympathetic and gave me priority...“I could not have got a restraining order without her – I could not have filled out all those papers. But the next time I had to appear she said “I don’t have the time today”. \textsuperscript{265} The growing volume of SRL’s makes this restriction is problematic for those who must return to the courthouse on numerous occasions, as this woman (who was seeking a restraining order against her spouse).

These comments raise the question of how much value duty counsel and summary advice models bring to SRL’s - and whether this represents the best use of the available resources for SRL’s. A more complete cost/benefit analysis would be necessary to answer this question conclusively. However this data suggests some modifications that might maximize the value of this model – which represents a significant volunteer contribution by some members of the Bar - and for more SRL’s.

e. What might make the summary advice model more effective?

Duty counsel and pro bono summary advice are certainly “lifesavers” for a significant number of SRL’s and the interviews contain many statements of appreciation and thanks for these services. However there is also a significant group for whom these types of services do not seem to be “working”. The types of modifications suggested by both SRL’s and service providers that might enhance the value of the duty counsel/summary advice model of legal services include:

i. Preparing SRL’s

SRL’s who would like advice on how to prepare for a interview with counsel could be offered this assistance, either by other staff at the service provider or as part of courthouse orientation and education for SRL’s.

ii. Specialized training for counsel

Particular training and experience is necessary to undertake the considerable challenges of working with SRL’s. Instead of regarding this work as the purview of younger, junior lawyers or law students, it is critical for this type of work to be seen as specialized, difficult and attracting additional educational and mentoring support. This might include developing training programs with the input of the clients themselves, in order to focus on their particular needs which may be quite different to traditional clients of private legal services.

\textsuperscript{265} BC35
For example, many SRL’s have already conducted some of their own research and may not present as traditional deferential clients. Their research may be incomplete or even wrong – but the fact that the client has already acted on their own behalf means that the professional relationship is a different one. One para-legal working with SRL’s observed “Many SRL’s do not want the advice, they know what they want to do they just need to know how to do it.”266 A similar comment is made by a courthouse service provider:

“After a while, some SRL’s don’t want to listen as they no longer system so long some feel they “know” what they are doing.”267

SRL’s who have been working on their own for some time are also likely to be extremely invested and emotional regarding their case, and demand skilful and patient listening and careful explanations. They may also be looking for understanding and support, especially if they are being given "bad news" by counsel.

All these skills are less likely to be developed in younger and less experienced lawyers. Again, this suggests that the type of service offered by pro bono counsel requires specialized training and support.

iii. Building in flexibility

The timing of summary advice is clearly a problem in some cases, where it comes too late to avoid the filing of incomplete forms, or to deter an action that may have little merit. The sooner that an SR: can receive advice and assistance, the better able they are to assess the potential risks and rewards of their case. While this requires the type of listening and explaining skills described above at (ii), it is probably easier to deliver at an earlier stage before a SRL has already expended time and energy of working on their case.

The limit on advice sessions to one per client – a stricture clearly circumvented by the most persuasive SRL’s who can talk their way into more sessions – is too rigid/ limited. Assessment on a case-by-case basis is time consuming and gives discretion to the “gatekeepers” who set appointments, but could be governed by guidelines that provide criteria for booking more than one appointments in some cases. At present the system seems to be ad hoc.

Most programming does not offer a lawyer to accompany a SRL to court (with the exception of court-based duty counsel models). Many SRL’s said that this was what they most wanted help with, because they were extremely intimidated of standing up and speaking for themselves in court. When asked in interviews, “How would you use a lawyer now, if you could have one? What would you ask a lawyer to do for you?” a majority of respondents who specified a particular form of assistance replied that they would like a lawyer to come with them to court and speak for them. This suggests that more thought should be given to the balance between offering in-court representation and the present model of summary legal advice.

Finally, it is noteworthy that community-based support services for the most vulnerable SRL's – often women facing domestic violence – operate a somewhat different service model that emphasizes ongoing advocacy and support rather than one-off technical advice. These services are often delivered primarily by counselors and domestic violence workers, who have access to lawyers for legal advice and in-court representation. Some SRL's may need support and advocacy more than they need (or want) legal advice, and certainly more than they want a single limited legal advice session.

f. Private legal services

i. SRL critiques

There was a great deal of very negative comment in the SRL interviews about the conduct of both their own (previously retained) counsel, and counsel on the other side. The broad themes of criticisms made of legal counsel whom they had previously retained are described above at 4(b). The general tone of these comments was that respondents who were critical of their former legal counsel were extremely resentful that they had spent so much money (in a few cases more than $75,000, with a significant group expending more than $20,000) on legal services that they felt did not represent value-for-money. Looking back, they did not understand why they had paid so much and achieved, in their view, so little in return. This resentment was sometimes heightened by a complaint that their lawyer had not listened to them or taken their input seriously, but had instead behaved as if it were “their” decision(s) to make.

The highest response to any one of our regular Facebook “Question of the Week” came to a question we posed in October 2012 about the education of future lawyers who would encounter SRL’s. The question read:

“Law school does not teach prospective lawyers very much about the needs of clients, and nothing about working with a self represented litigant on the other side. What would you like a law student and prospective lawyer to be taught about working with self reps? If you were addressing a law school class, what information would you offer them that would help them to approach self reps with understanding and professionalism?”

The emphasis in the many comments posted by SRL’s was on respect. For example,

“I would like to tell future lawyers that when working with a self-represented litigant, that they should show them the same respect and courtesy that they would

---

268 For example, in the fieldsite locations, South Fraser Legal Services, Luke’s Place, Osahwa, Hiatus House, Windsor Ontario to another lawyer. I would encourage them to negotiate with a self-rep. and go forward with a focus on mediation as opposed to trial.”

269 OSP 25

“Treat us with the same respect you want. Don’t assume we are stupid just because we have not gone to law school... Be prepared to face a person who will not back down and wants this resolved quickly and soon. They are not in it to make money but to get their lives back in order.”

Despite these criticisms, most of those SRL’s asked in their interview if they would want a lawyer to help them if they could now be provided with affordable, competent counsel responded in the affirmative.

ii. Comments about opposing counsel

In addition, there were many complaints by SRL’s about the conduct of opposing counsel in the 75% of cases where there was a legal representative on the other side. A few spoke about the helpfulness and civility of the lawyer on the other side – but these were a minority group. Many others described behavior and tactics that they understood as intentionally designed to bully and intimidate a person who is representing themselves. For example,

“As soon as he knew I was representing myself, he went in for the kill.”

“The lawyer for the plaintiff uses tactics such as harassment and bullying to try to confuse and intimidate me. It is very sad.”

References abound in the transcripts to lawyers’ using what SRL’s describe as “tricks of the trade” such as “snowing” them in paperwork, last minute cancellations, threatening them with costs, and refusal or delays in providing information. These comments may be understood as “merely” reactions to the inherently adversarial nature of legal proceedings, but nevertheless SRL’s response to this type of behavior lowers the reputation of the legal profession and raises public ire (see below, “complaints”).

Some SRL’s go further to claim that judges and lawyers see themselves as above the rules, whereas they are strictly imposed on a SRL.

“My ex’s lawyer treated me very poorly. When I pointed out to him that he needed to provide me with information and within a specified period, he responded “You’re not a lawyer, we don’t have to follow the rules.”
The small group (n=four) of lawyer SRL’s expressed the greatest shock - and sometimes disappointment - about the behavior of opposing counsel.

“The lawyers strategize to marginalize you because you are a SRL. And in fact, destroy one’s procedural rights by painting you as the angry stereotype SRL. I am shocked at the success of this stereotyping and how negative it is. Its unbelievable the contempt I am treated with.”

From the perspective of some counsel, SRL’s are given an unfair advantage because some judges will take more time with them and even “bend the rules” for them. Unsurprisingly, lawyers generally see the problem from the perspective of difficulties faced by counsel when there is an individual without representation on the others side. For example, should they provide them with any information or guidance? How should they communicate with them? Can they negotiate on equal terms?

However this issue is framed – and both perspectives without doubt have validity – the obvious response is to engage the Professional Code of Conduct for lawyers in each province. The Code could provide clear guidance to lawyers and should also entrench a commitment to respectful behavior by counsel towards SRL’s. Some excellent initial proposals have emerged over the last few years; a sustained effort is now needed to bring this material into the provincial Codes.

iii. Unbundled legal services

Many SRL respondents described a fruitless search for a lawyer who would “just” help them with a [art of their case – for example, reviewing their documents, checking their forms or coming with them to a hearing or court appearance. None called this “unbundling”, a term of art developed to describe the delivery of legal services on a task-by-task basis but that was exactly what they were describing. Respondents described seeking assistance with completing forms; reviewing completed forms and other documents; writing a letter to the other side; answering questions of law; preparing for a hearing; and representation in court for one hearing only (or someone to work with them in court, as one SRL called it “a switch-hitter” for his trial)

Those who were unable to find a lawyer who would provide services on this basis were both frustrated and perplexed. Part of their frustration related to not understanding why a lawyer could not give them some type of reasonable estimate of cost in advance.

\[276\text{ONG60}\]
\[278\text{See for example Wilding, K “Tips for Dealing with the Self-Represented Litigant” Ontario Bar Association Continuing Legal Education 2010, available at http://www.oba.org/oba/CDMarker/CDfiles/10INST2010/856110INST2010547123421538/PUBTab2B.pdf and “Canadian Code of Conduct for Trial Lawyers Involved in Civil Actions Involving Unrepresented Litigants” American College of Trial Lawyers, 2009. Note that among many promising provisions in the latter document, there is no mention of a duty to respect the SRL (just the court), which is one of the issues most frequently mentioned by SRL’s.}\]
\[279\text{ON47}\]
“A mechanic will tell you how long it will take and about how much it will cost – a lawyer won’t do that.”

SRL’s who had previously retained legal counsel were generally more successful in finding a lawyer (often their former legal counsel) who would assist them on an unbundled, task-by-task basis, for example, by making a one-off court appearance or reviewing documents. Even this group was small – just thirteen respondents in total. Each considered the input they received from a lawyer on an unbundled basis to be critical in enabling them to proceed effectively.

Janice had previously retained legal counsel in her dispute over custody with her daughter’s father with whom she had had a brief relationship. Having spent $29,000 on counsel within a few months, she could not longer afford him.

As the date of her trial (scheduled for nine days) approached, Janice (in the final trimester of a new pregnancy) searched for a lawyer who would give her unbundled advice. She knew she could not afford to pay for a lawyer to represent her at trial, but she needed at least to find someone who would help her to get ready and organized. One day she worked with her former lawyer’s secretary, who helped her organize her binders (she paid her at a lower hourly rate than the lawyer for this assistance).

Finally Janice found a lawyer who would give her unbundled advice. “Before the trial, I saw him every couple of weeks with a list of questions. This was what got me through the trial.”

iv. Para-legal services

Para-legals usually work under the supervision of lawyers in Canada and the United States, typically undertaking tasks that focus on legal procedures and paperwork such as drafting, assessing and filing documents, preparing motions and other paperwork. In other jurisdictions (for example the United Kingdom) the development of para-legal work outside the supervision of his profession has meant its expansion into areas that would traditionally be considered “legal work”, such as providing legal advice and opinions.

In contrast, Law Societies in Canada have been diligent in prosecuting the “unauthorized practice of law” where notaries, consultants and other para-legals venture outside the narrow scopes of practice that presently restrict them. In Ontario, the Law Society offers a licensing process (creating “licensed para-legals”) which is compulsory for any paralegal wishing to act as an advocate in a court or before a tribunal. The licensing process enables the Society to have oversight of para-legals and explicitly prohibits them from taking on any family work, restricting their practice to small claims, traffic and tribunal work, along with some provincial offences.

Some SRL’s complained that they did not understand why they needed to pay a lawyer’s hourly rate for some tasks which they believed could be carried out by a para-legal advance – and another part questioned the need for a person with the qualifications and hourly rate of a lawyer to undertake certain relatively simple tasks.

“Why can’t I get a sworn affidavit for $60? Why does a lawyer have to do it?” 284

A few SRL respondents talked about their interest in assisting other SRL’s as a para-legal, and three told me that they were developing a small business assisting SRL’s. One former SRL who is now assisting others commented that she was often shown lawyers correspondence by other SRL’s who asked her to help them understand what was written, and that she often ended up advising people how to deal with their lawyers. She commented:

“Many of my clients have lawyers, but they do not seem to understand them, or the clients feel they are not getting a straight answer to their questions. They end up asking me to coach them to deal with their lawyers. Some of these lawyers are charging $400-500 an hour and their clients ask me “Am I being duped?””

Three SRL respondents were themselves para-legals. Each commented that this was somewhat helpful since they already had some familiarity with legal procedure. In addition the study interviewed three para-legals, one from each province. Each of these individuals felt that there was an urgent need to re-examine present restrictions on para-legal work in light of public need for less costly legal services. Further, they each pointed out that the type of assistance that they could provide without formal legal qualifications was often just what some SRL’s actually wanted and needed in handling their own case; “(most people) do not want the advice, they know what they want to do and they just need to know how to do it.” 286 Another pointed out the appearance of conflict if the determination of the parameters of para-legal activity remains solely in the hands of the profession:

“[I do not trust the Benchers to decide the appropriate role of para-legals in the public interest – there is too much conflict of interest.”] 287

This study suggests that further study is needed of the extent to which para-legal assistance could be utilized by SRL’s, the types of existing para-legal activity are seen as most helpful by SRL’s, as well as a re-examination of the public interest in setting parameters for para-legal assistance.

11. Court appearances and interactions with judges

This study did not interview judges. This was not because their views on the topic of SRL’s are not extremely important – but because the study focused on the experience from the perspective of the SRL (as well as the observations of court staff working with SRL’s on a daily basis). The following section summarizes this data.

a. Negative experiences: overview

Whatever the stress and anxiety created by completing forms, filing and serving documents, and communicating with a lawyer on the other side, it is appearing in court – whether at a preliminary hearing or a full trial – that is always the most intensely anticipated and intimidating aspect of the SRL experience. Aside from a couple of individuals whose cases had only just commenced, almost all the SRL’s in the sample experienced appearing before a judge – and in many cases, multiple judges.

Even the most self-confident SRL’s experienced anxiety about speaking for themselves in front of a judge. Those who felt that they were well-prepared for the experience told us that they were surprised at how nervous they became as their court date approached, often losing sleep and sometimes becoming fixated on their case and arguments. This more confident and well-educated group also reflected that if they experienced this level of stress, how much harder it would be for others without their skills and advantages. One university-educated, confident and articulate SRL spent six years working on a case that required her to appear before a number of different administrative tribunals and judges.

“It was tremendously, tremendously difficult. I am an educated individual – but I go to court all the time with other people who are just way over their heads... (H)ow can a person handling issues like this on their own figure this out?”

Many SRL’s described themselves as terrified about the prospect of appearing in court. Some broke into tears in our interviews just thinking about it. Many recounted being unable to sleep for several or many nights before their appearance; shaking with nerves as they stood to speak; leaving court feeling upset, shaken and even humiliated; and experiencing stress-related symptoms for days afterwards.

289 AB71

290 For example, ON 64
“Everyday I went to court I was shivering and shaking all day. I was always concerned about what I would say – I just wanted to get it over with”

Most tellingly, the small number of SRL’s in the sample who also practice law described similar bouts of nerves. All these respondents described the difference they experienced between appearing as a professional on behalf of a client, and presenting an argument which had personal emotional and practical import. One lawyer-SRL, the applicant in a family dispute, described the impact of appearing on his own behalf – “even on uncontested motions, even for a case conference” – as follows.

“The hearing, the week before and the week after, I’m a wreck. After one appearance, I went back to my office and started to work on a file. I realized I couldn’t focus and then that I couldn’t remember anything about the file. In the end, feeling like an idiot, I went to the emergency room. I had temporary amnesia ... I lost my memory for 24 hours. Even coming in here today for this interview (this respondent was interviewed in a courthouse), I felt sick to my stomach”

The impact of unpleasant experiences in court is recounted many times in SRL interviews. The following story, recounted by a well-educated businessman in his 50’s, sets the scene. This respondent broke into tears as he spoke about his experience.

Paul’s lawyer said he could no longer represent him because he did not want to continue with a case that appeared to be heading to trial. Paul asked for an adjournment – giving notice to the other lawyer – in order that he could find another lawyer.

The experience of asking for an adjournment “was the worst experience of my whole life... it was embarrassing and humiliating. The judge blasted me as an incompetent father – I was shaking. I had never been treated like that in my whole life. He sent me out of the court and told me not to come back until I had a lawyer.”

It is clear from interviews that anxiety is a natural consequence of the fact that SRL’s generally have less understanding of the hearings process than trained lawyers or judges. However, this anxiety has a very significant impact on the hearings process itself (including how a SRL feels when the hearing is over, a feeling that is often carried into subsequent hearings), as well as the overall SRL experience of “access to justice”. SRL appearance anxiety needs to be carefully analyzed in order to explore its multiple causes to enable consideration of ways in which it might be reduced, in the interests of all parties (including members of the judiciary).
SRL anxiety about court appearances was related to a number of common themes, described below.

i. Feeling like an outsider

The mildest expression of anxiety about appearing in court focuses on the feeling of being an outsider, unable to properly participate due to the unfamiliar language, procedures and customs of the courtroom. One SRL described this as “(L)ike going as agnostic to a religious court” 294 Some SRL’s worried about appearing impolite to the Bench as a result of their lack of knowledge (see (b) below).

Many SRL’s commented about the impact of legal language used by judges and lawyers which they felt distanced them from the proceedings and made it hard for them to be sure they were following what was happening in the courtroom. In contrast, they observe, “(T)he lawyers and the judges speak the same language.” 295 While it is inevitable that lawyers and judges will use legal expressions that may not be familiar to SRL’s, this unfortunately contributes to a feeling of exclusion and even (from a SRL perspective) “collusion” 296 between lawyers and judges. “There is the appearance that the lawyers get special treatment because they understand the language.” 297 One SRL reflected this sense of disadvantage when he commented that going into court without counsel “(I)s like going into a gunfight armed only with a knife.” 298

Whereas some judges were complimented for going to some lengths to ensure that a SRL appearing in their court felt comfortable and understood the proceedings, others were described as behaving in ways that exacerbated the distance between the SRL and the court process. Sometimes the use of legal language appeared to be an intentional strategy to position the SRL outside the conversation.

“The judge told me to go and look up “res judicata” in the library. The lawyer for the other side wrote it on a piece of paper and tore it off and gave it to me”. 299

Other examples of judicial behavior described to me which created distance / exclusion included the judge talking primarily with the lawyer on the other side 300, cutting off the SRL when they asked a question (many described being told to “sit down” 301 in an abrupt and discourteous manner), or simply remaining aloof and distant in a way that created a feeling of exclusion (“the judge stayed on his throne” 302).
One SRL respondent made the interesting comment that this sense of exclusion could be addressed by the Bench simply showing “more kindness and compassion” towards SRL’s appearing before them.

ii. Not knowing how to behave

Many SRL’s told us that despite their best efforts, they did not know how they were expected to behave in court. Some worried about appearing impolite or discourteous. “I was so confused. I didn’t know when to sit and stand – I didn’t want to appear rude or disrespectful – I was so worried about that “

There were frequent complaints that this aspect of court procedure – for example, how to address the judge, when to stand and when to sit – was not covered in available on-line resources. “There’s nothing that says, “This is what you are supposed to say at trial.”

The anticipation that they would not be able to properly manage their court appearance created further anxiety among SRL’s, and sometimes resentment.

“When I tell myself my story, it makes sense. So I think that when I stand up in front of a judge and tell my story, I can explain myself. But I am so worried that when I stand up, I shall be cut down and not be able to make myself clear and stand up for myself.”

iii. Emotional investment

Some SRL’s spoke about the difficulty of managing their emotions when they were so personally invested in the outcome of their case. Most understood that if they presented their case with a great deal of emotion, they would almost certainly not succeed. Some described how they had trained themselves through a series of appearances to go to court with their emotions carefully checked.

“It’s hard but you have to wait your turn to speak and present yourself without emotion. When you do that, you can play on their field”

A number of SRL’s made this same point – “keep your emotions out of it.” when asked what advice they had for other SRL’s.

iv. Multiple judges

There were many complaints about the difficulty of appearing before multiple judges, especially in family matters. As one SRL put it, “It’s like a box of chocolates – you never know what you are going to get.” 309 Some family SRL’s complained that they felt as if they had to begin afresh each time they saw a new judge – in part by reviewing the facts but also, crucially, in developing a relationship with the judge and establishing their own credibility.

Occasionally a SRL found themselves in a case management system that meant that they saw the same judge several times over. This was always highlighted and welcomed. Aside from the practical efficiency, this continuity was extremely important in creating a sense of confidence in the system and reducing anxiety.

v. Judge did not read materials

There were many complaints that the presiding judge had not read the materials the SRL had worked on in advance. 310 While this may sometimes be difficult given demands on judicial time, this left some SRL’s feeling that their efforts in preparing materials were for naught.

“The judge came into the courtroom and the first thing she said was “I haven’t read anything”. “I was shocked, I was naïve enough to believe that the judge would at least have an overview of why the parties were there.” 311

This problem becomes further exacerbated when multiple judges sitting at different points during a single case. In the most extreme example,

“One time in court, the judges switched after a break and the new judge didn’t even look at the file. She had no idea of what had happened previously, or what point we were at.” 312

A few SRL’s told us that they believed that the judge only read the materials provided by legal counsel, and not by SRL’s, and many believed that their materials were treated as less important by the judge than materials provided by a lawyer on the other side. 313

vi. Prejudged by the judge

“I really don’t think that judges like SRL’s. The judge appeared annoyed with my attempt to self-represent and showed total (sic) bias and condescension in his tone. He had already subconsciously tagged me as an idiot.” 314

Many SRL’s told us that they were not taken seriously by the judge. This leads to a widespread belief among SRL’s that since they are going to be really listened to, they cannot expect a positive result.

“From my limited experience representing myself so far, I find that the judges sometimes go with the source that they perceive as “credible” – this means that big corporations or government with lawyers are always going to win” 315

In one case this assumption was made explicit by the judge.

“There was a settlement conference scheduled but the judge ordered that I must get a lawyer to represent me, or not take any further steps in the matter. The judge said ‘All self represented litigants lose.’ I did not reply - I was stunned.” 316

SRL’s who had spent many hours preparing for their hearing felt disappointed and discouraged when they encountered this attitude from the Bench.

“The judicial case conference was my first appearance...The master belittled me – he made a comment “just because you are a self rep, don’t expect any leniency here.” In fact I was well prepared. But he gave me a lecture instead.” 317

Some SRL’s described particular non-verbal behaviors by the judges who heard their submissions that left them feeling, just like this woman, “belittled.” 318 One described how “the judge rolled his eyes and played with his elastic band all the way through” 319 as she presented her case. Several talked about what they experienced as an inappropriate use of humor/laughter, usually between the judge and the lawyer on the other side. Others felt offended by the disregard they saw conveyed by the judge’s body language, for example; “He (the judge) sat back, swinging his chair, and eating candies, while he handed down his decision about where my children would live.” 320 Another SRL described a similar experience as she watched another case involving two SRL’s.

“At the Court of Queens Bench I observed two self representing parties. The judge had mentioned she had a 12:30 appointment and asked the people to ‘make it quick’. The gentleman was seeking the court’s help as his wife was taking his kids to Turkey. However, time was up and the Judge needed to move on. If I hadn’t seen it for myself, I wouldn’t have believed that a decision of this magnitude could be addressed with proper consideration.” 321

While there is often time pressure in the courts, there may be a failure in some instances to provide this explanation to the parties in a way that they can understand. In the absence of this clarity, some SRL’s believe that this means that the court does not care about ordinary people and their problems.

vii. A “two-tiered system”

Many of the complaints about not being taken seriously were associated with the observation that the judge preferred to talk with a lawyer (the other side was represented in 75% of the sample).

“Judges used to be lawyers, and they are biased in favour of the lawyers. The judges are only interested in talking to the lawyers. One judge actually said to me ‘I have no time for you.’” 322

At best, as one SRL put it, “I was always going second”. 323 Others complained that they were not permitted to speak at anything like the same length as the lawyer on the other side 324, and/or that they were cut short in their presentations, and/or that they were not consulted on procedural issues like adjournments or scheduling future events. Some complained that they believed that lawyers were given more leeway regarding procedural requirements while the SRL was held to a more rigid standard 325. The following is a typical example of such a complaint:

“On my last appearance the lawyer on the other side did not show up. The Master made me wait for four hours and then the lawyer rushed in at the last minute. If it had been the other way around this would not have happened.” 326

A practical example of the consequences of the more natural conversation and interaction between judge and counsel - which came up in several interviews 327 - relates to the drafting of consent orders. The usual procedure with both parties represented is for this document to be exchanged and approved by each prior to filing with the court. Where only one side has legal counsel, the practice appears to be developing that that representative will draft the order and submit it to the court. In several cases, this meant that the order was then filed without any review by the SRL (who then raised issues about its content and accuracy). Inevitably, this led to further disputes. This particular problem – and its possible solutions - is a good illustration of the interdependency of enhancements for SRL’s and efficiencies for the court.

The sensitivities of the larger and larger numbers of public visitors to the courthouses challenge some of our previously uncontested assumptions about access and privilege. Some SRL’s described the courthouse as having an embedded “apartheid” that privileged legal counsel. The examples they gave included: a registry counter system with lines for lawyers – shorter and faster – and lines for SRL’s; different security lines to enter the courthouse (again, the longer lines are the public lines); and even access to a water cooler at the front of one courtroom deemed “lawyers only”. Even the siting of the barristers lounge could raise hackles. For example, in Brampton, the comfortable couches and coffee machines inside the barristers lounge are clearly visible to members of the public through large plate windows as they wait in long security lines outside the courthouse.

viii.  Experiencing hostility

Fiona was owed almost $300,000 in support arrears - her ex-husband had stopped making any payments to her years before. After suffering a brain injury in an accident, Fiona was no longer able to work. She began an action to try to collect her support. She told me that she imagined at the outset that they would negotiate an agreement over the arrears; her main concern was to ensure that her ex-husband began to pay her support now that she no longer had an income.

Fiona was represented by counsel for more than two years, but ran out of money to pay her lawyer. She said that in this period, “nothing had changed – there had been no proposals for settlement, no meetings, no negotiation”. So she began to represent herself.

Fiona asked for a settlement conference, but nervous about her ability to manage an appearance, she asked her former lawyer to come with her just for that day. “I just couldn’t stop crying.”

328 For a different (and unusual approach), see AB4
Fiona’s fears of handling the settlement conference solo turned out to be well founded. As a person with a brain injury, she needed to take notes for her future recall, but the judge would not let her and told her, “Put your pen down.” Fiona explained why she needed to take notes and asked if someone else might sit with her and take notes on her behalf. The judge refused this request as well. “You must respect the court and you should not take notes when I am talking.”

Fiona tried one more time to explain that she had a brain injury. “You look pretty good to me” said the judge. “Sit down”.

While stories that could be described as illustrating “hostile” attitudes towards SRL’s were far less common than those that suggested irritation, impatience, or dismissive attitudes, a few – like Fiona’s - stand out. A few judges appear to be have adopted a siege-like mentality towards SRL’s, treating them rudely and harshly (a point also made by many service providers and court staff).

This hostility was illustrated in various ways in SRL narratives, including conflicts over the scheduling of hearings (for example conflicts with medical appointments or child care responsibilities), allowing multiple adjournments against the wishes of the SRL, accepting evidence that was out of time or improperly served documents – and sometimes in direct interaction between the SRL and the judge.

“The judge told me ‘Don’t bother coming back to court tomorrow if you’re not wearing a tie’ – this was his opening remark to me. It was just hostility, all the time.”

ix. Experiencing moral judgment

A very consistent theme among SRL respondents was that many judges seemed to view SRL’s as a nuisance and an irritation. Many report being told by judges – sometimes over and over in the course of their case – that they “ought to” retain counsel, along with an implicit or explicit statement that the fact that they were not represented was their “fault.” The SRL often described their attempt to explain that they could not afford a lawyer, but found their explanation dismissed.
“The judge I appear before keeps telling me that I need a lawyer. I keep saying that I cannot afford one. The judge asked me about my assets in court in front of other people, which was embarrassing – and then said that she does not understand why I don’t qualify for Legal Aid.” 334

Another described this as “.. a catch 22 - you can’t afford to hire a lawyer, but the courts don’t want you to represent yourself - and you can’t qualify for Legal Aid.”335

Judicial attitudes may stem from the continued assumption that individuals who are self-representing are “choosing” this course of action and “rejecting” legal counsel. As this study clearly shows, this is rarely the case; financial constraints are far more likely to be the real reason why an individual is self-representing (and many will have previously used counsel until they ran out of funds).

The persistence of the assumption that SRL’s want to “take on the system” may be the reason that so many told us that the judge not only failed to take their efforts at advocacy seriously (above), but also communicated their moral disapproval that they were representing themselves. One SRL reflected on the pervasiveness of this attitude, which so many experience and feel offended by.

“I’m afraid it only takes one influential judge to influence the others in coffee break chatter – that SRL’s are a bunch of dimwits. Then the standard is established and although they may be judges – and you would think they would be above this type of blanket perception – in the end, they are just people.”336

A few respondents speculated on the rationale for this pattern of behavior by judges. One mused,

“They (judges) seem to assume that if SRL’s lose, we shall have less of them. But its not working that way.”337

Several respondents who then went on to retain or to rehire lawyers (having had bad experiences in the first hearing representing themselves), talked about now being “a good girl/boy”338 now that they were represented.

“You have to have a lawyer so you can be part of this club...and appear to the judges to be a more conforming person.”339

334 ON21
335 AB35
336 AB2

b. Positive experiences: overview

Some – although sadly far fewer – SRL’s described a good experience with a judge who showed them understanding and kindness, and/or specifically helped them in some way. Where a SRL appeared before multiple judges, they fairly often (but by no means always) could identify one judge among the total (usually three to six different judges/masters) who they felt had treated them kindly. This comment – showing kindness - was the most commonly cited positive experience. We asked for further information about what that judge did that was particularly helpful340.

i. Respectful communication

“I recently attended a Family Court application with my self rep clients in X before Justice Y. He was absolutely wonderful to my self reps, he gave them time to speak, as well explained the procedures very clearly to them and treated them very respectfully.”341

Many SRL’s in their negative comments about judges emphasized that what they were seeking was respectful communication, rather than particular assistance or aid. For example, many emphasized the importance of being taken seriously,342. This para-legal (above) reflected on a good experience in which the judge provided some information to SRL’s but also, crucially, treated them “respectfully.”

ii. Assisted in problem-solving and settlement

A few judges were singled out for special thanks for assisting the parties move towards a settlement, a goal expressed by many SRL’s but often without a clear sense of how to achieve this. For example, this judge used a settlement conference to advance the resolution of a family case.

"She did more in one conversation – through some direct questions to the parties separate from their lawyers, in essence to interview them – more than my lawyer could do in three years.” 343

A few family judges were complimented for demonstrating a real commitment to put the rights and interests of children first. “The judge was amazing. She wasn’t on my side, but she was on the side of ‘what’s good for this kid.’” 344

340 See the excellent study by John Greacen “Effectiveness of Courtroom Communication in Hearings Involving Two Self Represented Litigants” Greacen and Associates for the Self Represented Litigants Network, published by the National Center for State Courts 2008. Greacen and his researchers watched judges in 15 hearings in US courtrooms dealing with self-represented litigants and found that the most effective judges developed a range of communication practices with SRL’s including asking questions, framing the issues, explaining the law, explaining their decisions, and describing compliance and effects of non-compliance.

343 BC2
iii. Coaching

Some SRL’s commented on assistance they received on their presentations. This was a small number, challenging the assumption in some parts of the legal profession that judges uniformly assist SRL’s, thereby giving them an unfair advantage. An even smaller number said that they received any help with legal argument; most of this assistance was in the form of style, not substance. For example, one SRL who was, by her own account, very upset and strained as she argued her case over custody, was told by the judge “If you change how you talk to people, then they will want to talk to you – you are making me bristly.” She appreciated – and adopted - this advice.

Some SRL’s commented that in their experience judges were generally more patient, understanding and respectful towards them than lawyers – perhaps because they have more experience than lawyers in dealing with SRL’s every day in their courtrooms.

c. Comments from court staff and service providers

Consistent with data from SRL interviews, court staff and service providers spoke about some judges who were willing to be helpful to SRL’s and others who were “getting better” – and others who had no time for them at all. Some saw judges expressing anger towards SRL’s. One group of service providers described SRL’s commonly feeling “scolded” by judges – “because they are not organized or do not know what to do.” While a few court staff and service providers named a particular judge whom they saw as going to great lengths to help SRL’s – sometimes too far, in their view – far more often they described judges as being disconnected from the reality of the SRL experience.

“Judges need to be less afraid and roll up their sleeves and deal with the public. ...Judges need to be dealing with the human side first - keep the formality, but be respectful of the human condition.”

When asked “what do you think are SRL’s most common frustrations?” a significant number of court staff and service providers mentioned judges. They talked about a widespread assumption among SRL’s that they would be able to speak directly to a judge and “make them understand”.

Some court staff complained that information they gave to SRL’s was sometimes contradicted by the judge, or that the judge might tell a SRL something that they could not achieve for them. This added to the frustration of the SRL and hence to the burden on counter staff.

d. Conclusions

“There are all these buildings – the courthouses - that are like false front buildings, like they have at Universal studios – they are supposed to help you, but they don’t.”

The negativity of so many SRL comments about judges make for upsetting reading, but they point to some deep-rooted problems that require our urgent attention. Read alongside the poor experiences of many SRL’s with legal counsel, they suggest that public confidence in the justice system is damaged, and diminishing further day by day.

A critical first step is to address the widespread misapprehension among members of the Bench and the Bar that SRL’s have other (better) choices to representing themselves. This fundamental misreading of the SRL phenomenon in 2013 leads to many other unhelpful assumptions – that SRL’s are intentionally bringing a feeling of chaos to their courtrooms, which they use to take unfair advantage. These assumptions are reflected over and over in the comments that SRL’s make about their treatment by judges. One SRL who had had a number of successful experiences in the past in small claims court said that he now saw a different climate in the courts, with judges “...corrupted by this SRL stereotype and (using) it to justify (their) own logic.”

Judicial appointment and education needs to reflect the new reality – especially in family court – that judges now deal with SRL’s on a daily basis. This is a huge change from 20 years ago and an unwelcome one for some judges. Discussing a matter with trained professionals is a completely different process – and one that judges have been well trained to undertake – than communicating with an (often) emotional and overwhelmed SRL. Some useful work has already been done to create judicial guidelines for working with SRL’s, and it is hoped that the conclusions of this study will feed into this ongoing work. However far more work remains to prepare judges for working with SRL’s (see Recommendations, below).

A few especially busy courts are beginning to offer a less intimidating forum for SRL’s at first appearance, with a special master assisting them to get ready to speak to a judge. This is a sensible development and should be considered more widely.

A few SRL’s\textsuperscript{359} point to a systemic problem. The foundational principle of the justice system (even in family matters) is adversarial advocacy. Judges and lawyers are accustomed to framing every interaction in these terms. SRL’s who lack training in law do not fit easily into this framework; and when they make efforts to adopt this strategy, they are often seen as unreasonable, ignorant and obstructive.

12. Personal and social impact on SRL’s

SRL respondents described a wide range of impacts and consequences for them arising out of their decision to self-represent. Many if not most of these were unanticipated, a least to the degree that they became a problem. The experience of speaking with so many SRL’s over the 13 months of data collection left the Principal Investigator with a very real sense of the impact experienced by many. At the same time, few SRL respondents saw any other choice. Where there were negative consequences for their lives they therefore saw these inevitable. This did not mean however that they did not carry a sense of grievance – and in some cases, embarrassment and astonishment – over the extent of these consequences.

a. Personal health issues

Many SRL’s describe stress-related consequences of acting as a SRL including depression and physical ailments (e.g. sleep disorders, headaches, weight loss, and depression). Some of these appear to be similar to the symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder\textsuperscript{360}.

“It’s a traumatic experience every time I walk into the court. The last time I went to court I couldn’t get out of bed after for three days.”

“The stress was making me stutter in court….you are so stressed, out of your mind, it all becomes a confusing mess. if I have to go to trial I just don’t know if I’m able to do it.” (in tears)

“For a while (after the trial) I could not physically go within a two block perimeter of the courthouse in X….I could not go on the computer after the trial either – I had spent so much time on that computer. I got rid of it and had no computer for six months. Then I bought a different computer and put it in a different place in my house.”

It is important to understand these symptoms as beyond the control of the individual. It also appears to be the case (as for example with PTSD) that these symptoms are not related to a pre-existing depressive or anxiety condition or vulnerability. Several SRL’s spoke about their amazement that the experience produced such strong emotions in them. In an interview with Macleans magazine in February 2013, one of the study respondents, a mild-mannered middle-class professional whom we have met and spoken with on several occasions described his experience this way:

“I truly believe I became borderline psychopathic,” he says. “I felt so frustrated, so limited in what I could do. I could write a blockbuster story about the nasty, mean thoughts that went through my head.”

A number of others described having to take time off work to recover from their symptoms, and a few gave up work altogether.

The experience for some of the small number of lawyer SRL’s in the sample was equally intense, despite the fact that they were accustomed to appearing in court on behalf of clients.

“I would say I was traumatized. I was sick for a long time, and I’m not over it.”

All the SRL’s in the sample had families and friends who were also affected by their experience.

“Judges, policymakers and justice system officers would benefit from the knowledge that intimidation, prejudice and not taking people seriously are not only stressful (and harmful) to those immediately involved, but to those people who love and support them as well.”

b. Financial implications

Some SRL’s describe having already expended their savings on legal counsel in earlier litigation. A few have now given up work in order to concentrate on preparing for their court case. One woman who is a Human Resources professional described how her increasingly acrimonious custody case – where her ex-husband is represented by counsel – “created so much work for me (like many SRL’s, she felt obligated to respond to everything she received from the other side lest she suffer some disadvantage) that it was impossible to keep working.” The consequence as she described it is “that my son and I are being pushed into poverty.”366

Others describe the impact of the time they spend working on their case on their work responsibilities, including days taken off to attend court and exhaustion from long nights spent preparing their case. Others say that they cannot look for work while they are absorbed with their legal action.

c. Social isolation

Despite their large and growing numbers, SRL’s have little contact with one another and their preoccupation with their legal case often isolates them from family and friends. As one respondent acknowledged:

“I dwell on it all day, every day. There is not a day that goes by when I don’t research this, think about it, I am basically fixated on this.”367

“I became so overwhelmed that I kept talking about it all the time and alienated myself from my friends.”368

At the same time, some family SRL’s suggested that it was inevitable that they would become “fixed” on their case if they were to commit the time and energy that they believed that it required especially if the matter came to trial.

“I lost touch with my sons during this time, I was so taken up with the trial. My relationship with my new girlfriend suffered. I was totally immersed in it, but I had to be.”369 (my italics)

The Project Facebook page has gradually developed a community of people who want to talk to one another. As further evidence of the extent of this isolation for some SRL’s, many said that they needed some face-to-face contact – and a sympathetic ear – even if they could access all the information they needed electronically370.

d. Failing faith in the justice system

The depth of skepticism being expressed in these interviews about the justice system is difficult to over-state. While some of the most extreme reactions border on the paranoid, many SRL’s appraise their experience in a rational and balanced way in coming to the conclusion that the justice system is “broken”. Their basic complaint is clear - that instead of a user-friendly, practical means of resolving disputes the courts offer a false promise of “access to justice”.

370 See above at (7)(b)
"No matter how right your cause is, you do not get the justice you deserve because it is about your resources."

This loss of faith is further expressed and reinforced by accounts of negative experiences with justice actors, primarily judges and lawyers. It is deepened by a widespread sense that judges and lawyers are not accountable for their behaviors. A very large number of those complaining about the actions of their own lawyer, the lawyer on the other side, and/or a judge who heard their case described their sense of injustice that there was in their view no effective process to hold this person accountable, anticipating that existing regulatory procedures for bringing a complaint would be ineffectual and a waste of their time, citing what many called "the old boys club."\(^{371}\) A few SRL’s have brought forward formal complaints, either regarding a lawyer or a judge; all but one have been unsuccessful. Just one respondent in the sample had succeeded in an action against her former counsel for negligence\(^{372}\).

The final story in this section synthesizes many of the points made above. It comes from a very sophisticated respondent who was pursuing a relatively “trivial” claim for property damage. It illustrates the way in which some SRL’s get pulled into the vortex of a case that then begins to impact their life to a far greater extent than anything they could have imagined.

Sonia\(^{373}\) was horrified when her artist’s studio was damaged in a fire. The fire had been accidentally caused by the landlord, and the resulting smoke and water damaged many of her paintings beyond repair.

While the landlord accepted responsibility for the damage, he did not want to make a claim on his insurance to meet Sonia’s claim for compensation. They negotiated for a while – she was asking for $1200 to cover the damage to her studio - but the relationship began to get acrimonious and Sonia realized she wasn’t going to resolve this by agreement. However “(A)s artists, we had no money to pay for a lawyer.” Sonia thought about dropping the case when she discovered how much work it was actually going to be – but she had had some other experiences in which she felt she had been taken advantage of – an accident in her car and another on her bike – and she now felt it was time to stand up for herself. So she decided to press ahead. “I felt at the time, "I can’t keep backing down, I need to stand up for myself.”

\(^{371}\) AB27
\(^{372}\) AB65
\(^{373}\) BC48
Despite her education and determination, Sonia found the process far more complex than she had expected. Filing the forms and serving the documents was difficult and time-consuming, but this was just the beginning. Sonia’s case began in a BC tribunal, moved into the small claims court, and then was appealed by the landlord into the BC Supreme Court.

When Sonia appeared in court for the first time, “I was terrified. It was so strange to find yourself in a courtroom and suddenly I felt like I had done something wrong.” All the paperwork filed by the defendant was about her character and made allegations about her truthfulness. By now the defendant was also representing himself and would not settle. In a full day mediation he proposed that both sides drop their claims. Sonia felt she could not give up and accept this.

They went to a three-day trial in the small claims court. “I felt like I was in a comedy law series, because the plot they had spun was so out of control but the problem was, it was being taken seriously. I had to pull in my whole family to help me – there were allegations being made about me that had to be addressed.” Sonia says that she was fortunate to appear before a patient and effective judge but he could not persuade the defendant to settle either.

Sonia won in the small claims court but the landlord appealed. She considered again hiring a lawyer, but was worried that it would be “crippling expensive”. By now, “I felt trapped – if I dropped out now, I might end up paying his costs”. She felt that she needed to finish this. Eventually the landlord’s appeal was dismissed. However Sonia never received any money from her judgment against him.

“If I have reached such an emotional breaking point over such a trivial issue, where no one was hurt and only a small amount of money is involved, what is it like for people who have lost significant amounts and have had real trauma? I was stuck in the system and could not get out. ... I would never ever bring anything into the justice system again, but if there is something really important at stake, that is where the system should be working.”
Part 5: Preliminary Recommendations

There is an urgent need to address the consequences of the large and growing numbers of people representing themselves in both family and civil court. Current initiatives are having some impact but are insufficient in terms of both scope and creativity. All parts of the justice system are affected, including courts administration but also members of the legal profession and the Bench.

These preliminary recommendations propose some first steps towards a proactive approach, while recognizing that the complexity of the shift away from representation by agents towards self-representation involves many unknowns. An overarching recommendation therefore is that in order to address this issue we remain open-minded, willing to innovate and experiment, and open to listening to the SRL experience. Taking a systems approach to the challenges we face is also more likely to be effective over the long-term than apportioning blame or privileging any single analysis.

Hopefully, the Dialogue Event (“Opening the Dialogue: the SRL Phenomenon” to be held at the University of Windsor May 9-11th 2013) will build on and strengthen these preliminary recommendations.

How SRL’s engage with the justice system

1. Court forms

Study findings:

While on-line court forms appear to offer the prospect of enhanced access to justice, many forms are complex and difficult to complete, and SRL’s often find they have made mistakes and omissions. The most common complaints include difficulty knowing which form(s) to use; apparently inconsistent information from court staff/judges; difficulty with the language used on forms; and the consequences of mistakes including adjournments and more wasted time and stress. These widespread difficulties result in frustration for SRL’s and additional burdens on court personnel, including registry staff and judges.

There has been some progress made towards developing user-friendly and simplified court forms, but it is far too little. Many court staff commented that they (and some lawyers) also had difficulty completing complex and lengthy court forms and keeping up with constant changes. In her assignment to apply for a divorce in the three provinces (The Divorce Applications Project), Kyla Fair also found that even with legal training, the forms were confusing, contained terminology she did not understand, and required an enormous amount of work and concentration.

Court guides are an important step towards assisting SRL’s complete forms and understand court procedure but these too are often written in a confusing and complex manner. In her “audit” of three sample Court Guides, Cynthia Eagan found problems very similar to those highlighted above by SRL’s regarding court forms (see (2) below).

Preliminary recommendations:

1(a) “Best practice” standards are needed that recognize the nature and scale of SRL problems with comprehending and completing court forms. Best practice standards should reflect systemic problems (above) and include: reducing the multiplicity of forms; simplifying language used on forms which is sometimes at a very high (grade 12 or 13) reading level and frequently includes legal terminology that SRL’s do not understand; ensure that information (and vocabulary) is consistent. Where forms are provided on-line, these should also follow the best practice standards adopted for on-line resources (above at (1)(a)).

1(b) It is not helpful for SRL’s who cannot afford to pay for legal counsel to be constantly faced with the admonition on each court form (and sometimes on each page of each form) that they “should” retain legal counsel. While this advice is important, there may be more sensitive and effective ways to bring it to the attention of SRL’s.

1(c) Complementary court guides for court forms and procedures should adopt the same standards. Where guides are provided on-line, these should also follow the best practice standards adopted for on-line resources (above).

1(d) Individuals (laypersons from a range of educational backgrounds) who have acted as SRL’s should be included in planning and reviewing materials and formats in order to develop and to achieve best practice standards.

1(e) The consequence of improperly completed forms is often severe for SRL’s, including delays in hearings and their access to a decision. A system for reviewing court forms and documentation prior to submission would save a great deal of judicial and administrative time and ensure that when SRL’s take time away from their employment and other responsibilities to attend court, they are not adjourned because of deficiencies with their paperwork. Providing a “form checker” to SRL’s would require some resources but would probably be more cost-efficient than allowing unchecked paperwork to go forward.
2. On-line resources

Study findings:

A large amount of the assistance presently made available to SRL's by the courts (and some service providers) is in the form of on-line information and related technologies (on-line forms, informational websites, and some video material). New initiatives in programming and support for SRL's in both Canada and the United States are largely based on the premise that access to the Internet can promote access to justice for SRL's.

While many of these initiatives are in relatively early stages of development, this study suggests there are significant limitations and deficiencies to this material. SRL's who anticipated that the proliferation of on-line resources would enable them to represent themselves successfully became disillusioned and disappointed once they began to try to work with what is presently available on-line. In particular, they identified the following weaknesses: an emphasis on substantive legal information and an absence of information on practical tasks like filing or serving, advice on negotiation or a strategy for talking to the other side, presentation techniques, or even legal procedure; often directed them to other sites (sometimes with broken links) with inconsistent information; and multiplicity of sites with no means of differentiating which is the most "legitimate". On-line resources often required some level of understanding and knowledge in order to be able to make best use of them.

The study data also shows that no matter how complete, comprehensive and user-friendly (standards we are still far from meeting), on-line resources are insufficient to meet SRL needs for face-to-face orientation, education and other support. Enhanced on-line technologies can be an important component of SRL programming – for example the development of sites developed specifically for SRL's making use of interactive technology - but cannot provide a complete service.

Preliminary recommendations:

2(a) Continued development of on-line materials for SRL's (by courts and other service providers) needs to take into account the considerable difficulties faced by many SRL’s in navigating and utilizing existing resources. In order to address these difficulties, “best practice” standards should be developed to include: eliminating legal jargon, ensuring consistency, enhancing the procedural “know how” aspect of on-line resources (presently focused primarily on substance), consolidating information as much as possible to avoid duplication and navigation among multiple websites, maintaining active links, and ensuring an appropriate reading level to enable accessibility for SRL's with a range of levels of education.
2(b) Individuals (from a range of educational backgrounds) who have acted as SRL’s should be included in planning and reviewing materials, formats and the development of best practice standards.

2(c) Questions and answers (including, for example, both a “decision-tree” style to direct users to the correct procedures/forms and “FAQ’s”) are essential to assisting SRL’s. Development of FAQ’s (frequently asked questions) for websites is another obvious way in which those who have had their own SRL experience could assist in the development of better resources for others.

2(d) Websites could play a larger role in directing SRL’s to the appropriate resources available in their community (mediation services, legal advice and legal information services).

2(e) There is the potential for greater interactivity in on-line platforms, as well as links to personal support via chat and phone. This would enhance the accessibility of on-line material and while not equal to face-to-face contact could help to personalize the experience and convey the sense that this material is fashioned for SRL’s, rather than treating them as “intruders” into the world of legal rules of procedures.

2(f) There is a similar potential for SRL’s to support and even mentor one another using on-line platforms. The experience of the Project Facebook (now more than 160 members and still growing) demonstrates that SRL’s appreciate the chance to develop a sense of community and mutual support.

2(g) Technical support and maintenance (eg maintaining live links, updating) for on-line resources is also lacking and requires investment and enhancement.

3. Access to legal information

Study findings:

It is clear that many SRL’s are eager to access further and better sources of legal information. This fits with the aspiration of many SRL’s to continue working on their case themselves once they have determined that they cannot afford to pay (or continue to pay) a private lawyer. SRL’s in the study were often seeking “guidance” rather than “direction”. The amount of work that many SRL respondents were prepared to do demonstrates their commitment to “get it right” – but they often lack the necessary resources and in particular, information. The expansion of legal information services (and the practical clarification of the legal information/legal advice distinction, below) has the potential to relieve pressure on more costly public legal services such as duty counsel (see below at (4)).

The most common source of legal information for SRL’s are court staff, primarily those working at the registry counters but also staff working in court programs such as Pro Bono Convocation - Treasurer's Advisory Group on Access to Justice (TAG) Working Group Report

Ontario, FLIC & LinC in Alberta, and the Justice Access Centres in British Columbia. These excellent services are not always clearly “signposted” in the courthouse or on the courthouse website; as a consequence some SRL’s appeared to have missed the opportunity to use these programs (this was also a problem for mediation services; see below at (4)). SRL’s consistently described staff working in these locations as the “most helpful” person they encountered during their SRL experience. However they also complained about the restrictions on the time and scope of information that these staff can offer, because of the limitation on their providing “legal advice” (which results in substantial personal discretion, which some SRL’s are better at exploiting than others) or because of the sheer volume of people they are dealing with.

The distinction between legal information/ legal advice which lies at the heart of the job descriptions of staff working on the court counters and in information services is consistently complained about by both SRL’s and staff, as at best unclear and at worst practically unworkable. The present situation places an unfair burden on court staff who are required to make constant determinations of how much information they can provide to frustrated and even angry SRL’s. This leads to inconsistent applications and creates a barrier between SRL’s and certain basic information that may be construed as “legal advice”.

Court and agency staff providing legal information to SRL’s described an almost identical set of frustrations and challenges to the SRL sample from their own perspective. They also accurately identified the primary frustrations and challenges of the SRL’s. Court and agency staff are working under enormous pressure dealing with the growing SRL population and constantly changing court forms and procedures. These are very stressful jobs, for which they poorly trained and remunerated.

Preliminary recommendations:

3(a) It is critical to ensure that local information services are clearly signposted both in the courthouse and on the court website, with a toll free number widely posted in the community.

3(b) The conventional distinction between legal information and legal advice requires urgent re-examination. It should be possible to achieve the assumed objective – constraining the “unauthorized practice of law” – in a more consumer-friendly and feasible way. In addition it may be important to revisit exactly what this constraint should mean in the new context of widespread representation without agents (for example discussing court procedures – or predicting what a judge would say?). Court staff need more and clearer guidelines to help them to determine, consistently and fairly, what they may and may not provide as information and in response to SRL questions.

3(c) Court staff – whether working on the counter, as court clerks, or in general or legal information services - require training that prepares them to deal with members of the public on a regular basis, including dealing with distressed and emotional people.
3(d) Regular training updates - whether on court forms or procedural changes - should be built into staff development budgets, to avoid staff being faced with forms and questions with which they are unfamiliar / cannot answer. This type of substantive and procedural updating could be offered on-line using a suitable web-based learning platform.

3(e) Court staff should have access to support services (for example as a part of an EAP) offering counseling and stress management programs.

3(f) Each courthouse should examine its present security systems (both inside the courtrooms and also at the counters) to ensure that staff can feel secure in the event of a disruptive person causing a disturbance.

4. Other support & resources for SRL’s

Study findings:

SRL’s talked about a variety of “non-legal” services that they needed but either were not available to them or in their present form, did not meet their needs. Service providers recognized over and over in interviews that the frustrations of SRL’s are a source of pressure on the justice system in general and on court staff and judicial officers in particular. Improving the experience for SRL’s by developing low cost support services for them has the potential for improving the efficiency and enhancing the morale of the entire justice system.

SRL’s particularly identified the need for orientation and education (aside from legal training) to enable them to better anticipate and plan for what is involved in self-representation. While this study did not evaluate the effectiveness of existing mandatory education programs, it is clear from the study data that many SRL’s are looking for different forms of educational workshops to prepare them for the SRL experience. In particular, they are asking for practical tools and skills that they can apply.

SRL’s also described a need for one-on-one assistance in the form of “coaching” (eg document review, answering questions) which support them to handle their own case but also provide checks and moral support. For many SRL’s who wish to remain in control of their own case, coaching would be an important resource.

A significant number of SRL’s say that they were never offered mediation, and/or do not know what it is. This is a clear gap that needs to be urgently addressed (for example in both educational workshops and better publicity). Some SRL’s were nervous about participating in mediation, especially where there was a lawyer representing the other side. Some SRL’s who wished to try to resolve their case expressed frustration that the Bench would not exercise greater pressure on a recalcitrant opposing side to come to mediation.

At present many SRL’s bring friends and/or family members with them to the courthouse for moral support, especially on appearance days. This is a reflection of the need expressed... by many SRL respondents for some type of protection against what many experience as a lack of compassion and kindness in the system, especially from some judges. However there is a great deal of confusion and inconsistency surrounding the role of friends or supporters of SRL’s, as well as the potential for an unrepresented person to being a McKenzie friend into the courtroom. This lack of clarity and wide exercise of discretion by some judges is creating resentment and confusion.

Finally, many SRL’s do not have access to the types of office facilities that they require in order to represent themselves including printing services, photocopying facilities and even computers. Some services are presently provided by counter staff (informally) or overburdened court-based programming.

Preliminary recommendations:

4(a) Educational workshops

If educational workshops are to be attractive to SRL’s they should focus on offering practical skills and information, offered by instructors who can provide a skills-based focus, with opportunity for interactivity and asking questions, in group sizes that permit this. Workshops should not be mandatory but SRL’s could be strongly encouraged to participate in such sessions. If SRL’s perceived such workshops to be useful to them in preparing for their SRL experience, they would participate.

An SRL orientation workshop should be offered in every courthouse (perhaps less frequently for smaller courthouses) for all individuals filing without representation. Given that so many SRL’s evidently begin with representation (53% in this study) such information should also be provided to any individual at the time of filing, whether represented or not. An orientation workshop should be framed less as a legal information seminar and more as an orientation to what lies ahead, and might be best offered by non-lawyers. Such workshops should include time for questions and answers, which may or may not require the presence of qualified lawyers. SRL’s need to be better informed about the many challenges they will face, including the amount of time required to complete the necessary preparation, the potential impact on their work commitments, the emotional toll of self-representation, the potential impact on social relationships, and even the mental health consequences. At the same time (and this is a difficult balance) it is very important that SRL orientation is not designed to discourage or deter self-representation – but rather to be clear and concrete about its challenges.

Another critical area of SRL education presently lacking is how to progress one’s case towards an acceptable negotiated outcome. SRL’s receive little or no information about how to resolve their case and how to talk to the other side about a possible settlement (which may be especially intimidating if the other side is represented by a lawyer). A workshop or workshops could prepare SRL’s for thinking about settlement and how to make effective use of available settlement processes, including how to prepare for and behave in mediation and judicial settlement conferences, how to negotiate directly with the other side about settlement, how to generate settlement proposals, and how to finalize settlement agreements by consent order. Where a court offers mediation services, this program should consider offering an orientation workshop that offers practical skills and tips to SRL’s.

SRL education should be the responsibility of the justice ministries and ideally promoted and offered in the courthouses. Programming could be provided by outside specialists with the input and assistance of court staff. In developing programs and workshops, those who have had the experience of being a SRL should be consulted.

4(b) Coaching

Rather than focusing on legal issues and procedures, coaching could be offered by specialists in (e.g.) communication, negotiation, and presentation skills (all areas that SRL’s described as important but often lacking from their own experience and expertise). In particular, one-on-one coaching for settlement / preparation for mediation / strategic assessment of resolution options would be extremely valuable for many SRL’s who wish to pursue settlement, but do not have the tools and skills to do so.

4(c) Mediation services

It is critical to ensure that local mediation services are clearly signposted both in the courthouse and on the court website, with a toll free number widely posted in the community.

Mediation services should consider offering initial orientation and training specifically designed for SRL’s, to enable them to participate more fully and confidently in their programs. This could take the form of an initial session with the mediator in their case. Competent and experienced mediators are already accustomed to accommodating any additional time that some parties require for coaching and preparation before mediation without compromising neutrality.

SRL’s who have had good experiences in mediation should be invited to provide “testimonials” to other SRL’s who may be nervous about the idea of using mediation.

Where one side is interested in mediation, the Bench should consider using their persuasive powers to encourage the other side to seriously consider this. At minimum, judges should enquire whether SRL’s have considered using mediation.

4(d) “Office” services

Office services available for use by SRL’s should be consolidated in a central coalition in each courthouse. Such services would have to be operated at cost, but there it is clear that the convenience of such a facility in the courthouse would be significant. This would also relieve pressure on court staff and staff at court-based programs who are currently bearing the brunt of such demands.
4(e) Mentoring and “friends” of SRL’s

There is a clear need for a “buddy” / mentoring system to support SRL’s in their emotional as well as their substantive and procedural journey. Each courthouse should develop a clear and consistent protocol for the role of SRL “friends” (that is, informal supporters rather than “McKenzie friends”: see below) that sets out expectations and responsibilities for appropriate access and behavior. Since physical facilities vary among courthouses it is important that the local protocol is practical and feasible for that building, although general guidelines could be set provincially. Ideally, local protocol could be determined by a committee that includes some SRL representatives. A similar protocol should be established in each courthouse for the use of “McKenzie friends” to avoid confusion and inconsistency.

Each courthouse should also explore the possibility of developing a formal buddy/mentoring scheme utilizing volunteers (perhaps along the lines of Victim Assistance programs) for SRL’s. This should build on the premise that assisting a SRL to feel supported and calm will enhance their experience, as well as the experience of those who deal with them.

4(f) Opening hours

Courts should consider some extension of opening hours in order to accommodate the growing numbers of SRL’s who have to take time away from their employment in order to file documents and appear in court.

SRL’s, judges and lawyers

5. The delivery of legal services to SRL’s

Study findings:

This study shows clearly (and consistent with other recent studies) that the primary reason for self-representation is financial. Many SRL’s find that the legal services that they can realistically afford are simply not available to them. They also often find that their desire to prioritise the specific areas in which they want assistance is not possible. What they are faced with is a decision to engage in a traditional legal services model or to forego legal services. The problem for many SRL’s is that financial retainers and services billed at a rate of $350-400 an hour are beyond their means, and even those who can afford to pay initially often run out of funds or willingness to continue to pay at a certain point.

At the same time, 86% of the SRL sample sought legal counsel, either in the form of private legal services of legally aided/ pro bono assistance. SRL’s are not saying that they do not want lawyers to help them – but that the way in which lawyers are currently offering their services does not fit within their budget. Some are also saying that they prefer to have more control over the progression of their case and resist the traditional assumption of professional control by their lawyer.
Other complaints made consistently by some SRL’s about their prior legal services in their case include: counsel “doing nothing”, no progress; counsel being disinterested in settlement possibilities and processes (including mediation); counsel not listening to them or consulting them in decision-making; and a sense that their lawyer was insufficiently familiar in the relevant area of law to be effective as counsel. A further complaint was that lawyers were not truly accountable to the public, and that efforts to question their competence (including but not limited to costs in relation to the services provided) were often not taken seriously by the courts or the regulators.

While many SRL’s appreciated the assistance they received from duty counsel or other pro bono legal services, the study also found dissatisfaction with the most common model of delivery ie the summary legal advice model. While this model works well for some SRL’s, others find a time limited opportunity to speak with legal counsel leaves them more confused, and even panicked, than before. At the same time, court duty counsel models are in serious overload. For both reasons, there is a need for a reassessment of how to offer the maximum value to the maximum number of SRL’s via the summary advice model.

Respondents frequently questioned the limitations placed on the provision of assistance by para-legals, especially in relation to family matters.

Finally, many SRL’s sought some type of “unbundled” legal services from legal counsel; for example, assistance with document review, writing a letter, or appearing in court. Relatively few were successful in accessing legal services on this basis despite a sustained effort. This was perplexing to many respondents, who could not afford to pay a traditional retainer and envisaged that they could undertake some parts of the necessary work themselves, with assistance.

These findings (which are supported by other studies) raise the pressing question of how private legal services are structured and delivered in an era in which a majority of litigants in some family and civil courts are without counsel.

Preliminary recommendations:

5(a) The summary advice model

In order to fully evaluate and enhance the summary legal advice model, we need to:

(i) Re-evaluate the types of advice that must be provided by lawyers, and the potential for other important and needed information and assistance to be offered by para-legals (see also (3)(b) above).

(ii) Offer SRL’s an orientation with a staff person before they meet with counsel (either duty counsel or a limited legal advice session) to enable them to prepare questions and focus their concerns, in order that they may obtain maximum benefit from that limited session.
(iii) Consider the present system of limiting access to a fixed number of legal advice sessions. Where a SRL returns over and over again to try to access a limited legal advice session, a different strategy is needed to help/support that SRL and relieve the burden on a single source and type of assistance.

(iv) Consider including a workshop format for answering questions. For example, an open workshop could be offered on questions regarding filing and serving documents, preparing to appear in court, making a proposal for settlement to the other side etc. Such sessions would require experienced counsel and could include a (non-lawyer) moderator.

(v) Consider extending the role of pro bono counsel to court appearances in particular circumstances. Where this is not possible, an alternative course might be for counsel to brief a McKenzie friend along with a SRL prior to a court appearance.

5(b) Para-legals

Policymakers and professional regulators should commit to a re-evaluation of the historical reasons for the restriction of para-legal services in Canada, in the light of data in this and other studies on SRL needs. This evaluation should consider what rights-protections require the intervention of a qualified lawyer and how to identify and prioritize those cases in a public legal services model. Such an evaluation should consult SRL’s as well as lawyers, court staff and other stakeholders.

This evaluation of para-legal services should also consider private paral-legal services. Many of the needs described by SRL’s in this study could be met by para-legals at a much more affordable rate than lawyers. Such an evaluation should include urgent reconsideration of the types of assistance that can be lawfully offered by (licensed) para-legals, especially in relation to family matters where the need appears to be greatest.

5(c) “Unbundling”

Demand from clients for models of legal service beyond the traditional retainer arrangement is becoming deafening. This is especially clear in relation to requests for “unbundling” from personal clients who cannot otherwise afford to pay for legal services. The historical reluctance of the Bar to consider “unbundling” needs to be transformed into efforts to find answers to legitimate concerns about due diligence and insurance issues. These issues are solvable within (e.g.) a modified professional indemnity model, and appropriate rules of professional conduct. While no lawyer can be required to offer unbundling, CLE programming should be developed to offer skills training, file management and billing procedures that are compatible with offering unbundled legal services.

5(d) Legal costs

There were numerous complaints from SRL’s about the failure of lawyers to describe or explain the costs of their services. There is an urgent need to train lawyers to provide more complete and transparent information about costs to their clients and before they present them with a bill. Sensible cost estimates are possible, and failure to provide them is bringing the profession into disrepute.

5(e) Complaints against lawyers

The present system of accountability – whether the court assessment procedure for legal costs or bringing conduct complaints to the professional bodies for conduct complaints – requires re-examination in the face of widespread public skepticism.

5(f) Code of Conduct

The widespread complaints of both SRL’s and lawyers about the uncertainties and tensions where a SRL faces off against legal counsel will not be dealt with simply by developing more “rules” – but that would be a good place to start. It is important to revisit the Professional Code of Conduct for lawyers in each province on the question of the conduct of lawyers facing a SRL. The Code could provide clear guidance to lawyers and should also entrench a commitment to respectful behavior by counsel towards SRL's. This does not negate the responsibility on the part of SRL’s to adhere to appropriate and respectful standards of behavior in court and in dealings with counsel (as well as judges and other court staff) but the framework of a Professional Code is an important step in these discussions.

5(g) Legal education

Prospective lawyers need to be exposed to the realities of the SRL phenomenon. The law schools should urgently consider developing courses that as well as providing up-to-date information about the influx of SRL’s into family and civil courts, also take on the challenge of teaching law students skills that are important for dealing with a SRL on the other side. Course should also address practical issues such as how to evaluate providing “unbundled” client services. SRL’s highlight in particular the need for lawyers to be more engaged in settlement and open to resolving matters with them. There may also be a role for law school to take on some of the orientation for SRL's described above at (4)(b).

6. The judicial role

Study findings:

The influx of SRL’s into the family and civil courts has dramatically altered the judicial role. Judges, especially in family court, now find themselves dealing with SRL’s as often as with lawyers representing clients. This is a huge sea change that some members of the judiciary are clearly adjusting to better than others. The study data is replete with SRL descriptions of negative experiences with judges, some of which suggest basic incivility and rudeness. There are also some examples of judicial interventions such as providing advice regarding court procedure, coaching on presentation, and progress towards settlement, which attract positive comments from SRL’s. Other studies show that judges are concerned about showing "favour" towards SRL’s and find themselves in a difficult position when one side is represented by counsel, and the other is not.

Most SRL’s saw numerous judges during the progress of their case, and many complained that this created inconsistencies and required them to re-establish their credibility with each appearance. Very few SRL’s experienced a single judge who managed their entire case, but those who did were far more satisfied with their overall experience.

Whatever the merit of their individual complaints, there was a very widespread sentiment among SRL’s that judges were not truly accountable and that the current mechanism (under the auspices of the Canadian Judicial Council) is a protective rather than an investigative system.

Preliminary recommendations:

Judicial education

6(a) Further judicial training to support judges in working with SRL’s on a regular basis is urgently needed. This training should include effective communication skills, facilitation skills and stress reduction strategies.

6(b) Judicial education should be developed with reference to the perspective of SRL’s as well as legal actors. Training should be based on dealing with “ordinary/majority” SRL’s, for example those who contributed to this study. It is important that such training is not framed from a “siege” mentality but rather considers the needs of the ordinary SRL.

6(c) Additional training to enable the identification and management of vexatious and disruptive SRL’s should also be provided.

Judicial appointments

6(d) The demands of dealing with SRL’s, and the relative skills and willingness of the candidate in this respect, should be considered factors in criteria for judicial appointments, and especially to the Family Bench.

Judicial procedures

6(e) A Code of Conduct for judicial management of SRL’s should establish appropriate new norms of judicial practice. Such a Code should be based on common problems and difficulties faced on both sides (judges and SRL’s; it could also consult court clerks). This is a project that could be taken on by judicial educators and developed through judicial training sessions (see above at (b)).

In the absence of a formal Code, the study data suggests the following recommendations where one side is represented by counsel, and the other is not:
6(e)(i) A judge might consider opening the hearing with a short speech from the Bench welcoming the parties and setting out his or her expectations for the conduct and procedure of the hearing (including explaining and establishing his or her authority over process in the courtroom). This might include giving an opportunity to the SRL to ask a question / clear up any misapprehensions about procedure at the outset. Such an opening would need to be time limited, but with careful planning could be delivered in 5-8 minutes.

6(e)(ii) A judge should give serious consideration to allowing the SRL to bring a friend and/or a McKenzie friend into the courtroom with them (see also above at (4)(e)).

6(e)(iii) A judge should ensure that the SRL understands when s/he is to be asked to speak and should take care not to give the impression that the Bench is only interested in what counsel has to say.

6(e)(iv) A judge should ensure that any forthcoming consent order drafted by counsel is sent to the SRL for review before being submitted to the court.

6(f) Single judge case management

Progress towards maximizing single judge case management (especially for family matters) should be seriously considered in every courthouse. While this has immediate resource implications, single judge case management may save time and money in the long-term and has been shown to greatly enhance litigant satisfaction.

6(g) SRL courts

There is some limited experience with special SRL courts (eg in Calgary) and this is a development that may have promise. Moreover, it allows judges who are willing to work with this population to begin to develop this as a judicial specialty. A related and promising innovation that deserves a full evaluation is the use of a “First Appearance Master” at Jarvis Street OCJ who readies family SRL’s for their first court appearance.

6(h) Complaints against judges

The present system of judicial accountability via the Canadian Judicial Council requires re-examination in the face of widespread public skepticism.
System Implications of the SRL Phenomenon

7. Social impact and consequences

Study findings:

The study data vividly illustrates the range of negative consequences experienced by SRL’s as a result of representing themselves. These include depletion of personal funds and savings for other purposes, instability or loss of employment caused by the amount of time required to manage their legal case themselves, social and emotional isolation from friends and family as the case becomes increasingly complex and overwhelming, and a myriad of health issues both physical and emotionally. The scale and frequency of these individually experienced consequences represent a social problem on a scale that requires recognition and attention. The costs are as yet unknown.

Preliminary recommendations:

7(a) Further research should be conducted as a matter of urgency to investigate the relationship between litigation as a SRL and social consequences including financial hardship, difficulty maintaining employment, personal and mental health issues, as well as the broader impact on children affected by the SRL phenomenon. This research agenda should also include an assessment of the fiscal impact of these social consequences in relation to (eg) court time, welfare systems, and public services.

7(b) Community agencies that presently do not focus their work on SRL’s but see growing numbers of clients who are involved with self-representation should consider what resources and relative funding they should anticipate going forward in order to provide support services to this population.

7(c) SRL’s themselves should consider forming support groups to enable other SRL’s to find a community that can offer morale support during and even after their self-representation experience.

8. Culture change

Study findings:

This study shows clearly that among most SRL’s, self-representation is not a choice but a last resort or a necessity. A reorientation to a justice system in which individuals frequently represent themselves rather than relying on expert agents has implications for how SRL’s are regarded, welcomed and treated in the courts by staff, lawyers and judges. This is creating a crisis of faith in the Canadian justice system.
Preliminary recommendations:

The following are critical elements in this culture shift that the professional bodies – for example the provincial law societies, the National Judicial Institute, the Canadian Judicial Council, and the Canadian Bar Association – as well as the Canadian law schools are encouraged to consider the following:

8(a) That most SRL’s are unrepresented by necessity, and not by choice. This recognition alone has many implications for how we think about SRL’s and how to best meet their needs.

8(b) The parallel recognition that pressure on public resources and the cost of private legal services makes it likely that a substantial SRL population in the courts is here to stay.

8(c) The importance of creating more choices for clients in accessing private legal services, and in particular in the financial structure of legal services.

8(d) The role of the law schools and other legal educators (including CLE providers and judicial educators) in integrating changes in the traditional “rules of engagement” of professional services (in which the professional, here the lawyer, is “in charge” and “knows best”) into their programs. Lawyers need to be better prepared to work in partnership with their clients in making both strategic and financial decisions.

8(e) A open-minded re-examination of the protected parameters of the lawyers’ role in Canada and serious consideration of the potential role of other legally trained professionals who are not qualified lawyers.

8(f) A move away from the adversarial model and a reorientation to problem-solving in a multi-professional context. This includes: more widespread, consistent and effectively endorsed provision of mediation services, both inside and outside the courthouse; further judicial education in the conduct of settlement conferences, including conferences in which one or both parties are self-represented; and the development of specialized services for SRL’s that offer them assistance with negotiation and participating in mediation.

8(g) The establishment of an ongoing policy dialogue in the form of an national steering group/ advisory body that is inclusive of all stakeholders, that can act as a convenor for further dialogues, initiate and continue research, and make further recommendations and monitor new pilot programs and initiatives.

Appendix C: Service Provider Interview Template

1. Have you seen significant changes in the last 3-5 years?
2. What do your users come asking for/ expecting?
3. What are the socio-economic characteristics of the SRL’s you see at your agency? Are there are other characteristic patterns (substantive/ issue-based, psychological, ideological) of the SRL’s you see at your agency?
4. What do you think are the most common motivations for self representation – money or other reasons?
5. How often do they have friends with them to help/ support?
6. Have they considered / tried alternatives to court?
7. What is their most common frustration?
8. What is your most common frustration?

Appendix D: SRL Focus Group Template Questions

1. Why did they decide to represent themselves? Was this due to financial reasons? Were there other reasons? Does anyone feel that they would have done much better with a lawyer to represent them? What difference would a lawyer make?
2. What is the distance between what they expected at the outset – and what actually happened (court process, interaction with justice system actors, challenges, rewards)?
3. What was the impact of the experience on them? Emotionally – economically – in relationship terms – other?
4. How could the system work better if it was adjusted to meet the needs of SRL’s? Could there be more opportunities for early resolution? More information for SRL’s? Access to legal advice/ services?

Some focus group participants also provided demographic data as set out at Part A of the SRL Interview Template, Appendix D below.
Appendix E: SRL Interview Template

A. DEMOGRAPHICS

i. Gender

ii. Are you the plaintiff (petitioner) / the defendant (respondent)?

iii. Is your case ongoing/ concluded?

iv. Age (banded)

   Under 20

   30-40
   40-50
   50 plus

v. What is your income level (banded)

   Under $30,000
   $30,000 - 50,000
   $50-75,000
   $75,000 - 100,000
   More than $100,000

vi. What is your highest level of education (banded)

   No high school diploma
   High school diploma
   College
   University/ professional qualification
   Other (specify)

vii. Have you ever retained a lawyer in the past?

   If yes, was that experience good – OK – bad?

viii. Have you retained a lawyer (may include a Legal Aid lawyer on retainer but not an occasional advisor eg duty counsel) to represent you at any stage in this case

ix. Are you receiving free legal advice from a service or agency?

   If yes, from what source

x. In which court is your action filed?

   a. Family
   b. Civil (under $25,000)
   c. Civil (over $25,000)

First language?
Do you take a support person with you into the court?

Are you comfortable using the computer for research?

Is the other side represented by a lawyer?

B. TOPIC GUIDE

1. Deciding to use a legal process (as plaintiff/defendant, applicant/respondent)

   Previous experience with the legal system; expectation at the outset of this case of what you could achieve; how likely? (above); did you consider any alternatives to using the legal system? Why did you decide not to pursue alternatives? (cost, process, outcomes, emotions)

2. Deciding to represent yourself

   Previous experience with lawyers; assessment of what you would gain by being represented by counsel; assessment of your own ability to represent yourself; did you bring anyone else along with you to help? How important was the issue of costs in deciding to represent yourself? If you could have representation at just one step in the process when would that be?

3. Resources

   What resources have you used? What difference did these resources make to you? Who was the most helpful person you have met so far? What was the most helpful resource(s)?

4. Your experience and appraisal

   How close was what has happened in the legal process to what you expected? What are the major differences? What was your biggest surprise? Your biggest disappointment? The best moment? What else would you like to happen procedurally that has not? Did you use / are you planning to use mediation? Why/why not? What would you tell another SRL are your lessons from this experience? Would you choose to represent yourself again? What would you do differently another time? If you could have a (free, competent) lawyer now, what would you ask them to do for you? What would you say to the Chief Justice’s Task Force on Access to Justice which is currently working on these issues?

Final Thoughts

- it appears that there would be a substantially greater number of forms to fill out if there are children involved
- there are other forms listed that I would need to bring to the court that I do not understand how to obtain (ex. Praecipe to note in default, divorce judgement, etc.)
- still left with the same questions I was after applying for divorce in Ontario

- this is a guide to getting divorced
- after 20 mins, I have determined that this guide is useful only in giving the “broad brushstrokes”
- explains what divorce and separation are, what the general process is, what happens after divorce etc., but gives no indication of how to start the process |
| Googled "applying for divorce BC" | - i keep getting led back to the http://www.familylaw.lss.bc.ca/guides/divorce/ link, so I clicked a link called “legislation/court rules” under this website and came to a very long PDF doc of the Court Rules Act
- this is exactly like what I would see in a Civ Pro law class- how could an average person even begin to decipher this?
- also, I am not sure if I need provincial court rules or superior court rules, and cant find any information on this
- after reading through the rules for a few minutes, I have determined I need to look at the Superior court rules
- when I go to the superior court rules, I am shocked at how long they are.. the table of contents is 20 pages |
| Navigated to Part 3 of the Court Rules Act: “How to start/defend a family law case” | - completely confusing- detailed rules and sub-rules about how to fill out each form- I know I have to fill out form F3 and then serve it (rule 6 discusses requirements I must meet while serving), and there are separate forms for child support and spousal support that all have their own rule requirements that must be met.
- after looking through these rules, I am wondering whether I found the correct forms for the Ontario and Alberta divorces, because BC has been much more difficult |
| Clicked “Court Forms” link, navigated to form F3 (General Application) | - very easy to miss a step because there are drop down boxes on the left that require information but can be easily missed
- as I am going through this form it is becoming apparent that I have to keep referring back to the rules, because the question will state for example “I have not condoned any act relied on under section 8 (2) (b) of the Divorce Act (Canada) as a ground for divorce.”
- like the other provinces, this form asks that if you are claiming division of property or spousal support etc, you propose the | grounds. This would be difficult for someone who has no idea what is reasonable to ask for/suggest

Appendix I: Report of the Court Guides Assessment Project (by Cynthia Eagan)

I volunteered to assist Dr. Macfarlane’s work after reading about her in the July 8, 2012 edition of The Windsor Star. I am a public librarian and on occasion, I am asked to help locate and evaluate legal information. I took an elective in university, years ago, on legal research. This is my background. It may be more than many SRL’s who come to this task with no background at all. However I am certainly no expert in this field.

This was not an extensive review. It was a volunteer, time-limited effort. I don’t want my report to be considered fault-finding. Legal information is complex, time-sensitive, and often structured in ways not intuitive to the public. It just is. For my small part, I felt overwhelmed by the amount of material online. I could have spent hours scaling the terrain. And when I printed it out--thinking that doing so would simplify it, make it tangible-- I just made mountains. We still need legal professionals.

I volunteered to review a document to evaluate:

- the document’s reading level
- whether the experience of navigating URL’s was easy
- whether the material used accessible and easily understood language
- whether the material avoided jargon
- whether language and terms were consistent throughout
- whether there seemed to be important unanswered questions
- whether there was a reference point for further questions

In consultation with Julie Macfarlane, I chose the following documents to review:

From British Columbia:
“Applications to Court” available at:
http://www.supremecourtbc.ca/sites/default/files/web/Applications-in-Supreme-Court.pdf

From Alberta:
“Alberta’s Family Law Act: an Overview” available at:
http://www.albertacourts.ab.ca/cs/familyjustice/FLAOverview.pdf

From Ontario:
“Guide to Serving Documents” available at:
1. Reading Level

I used Microsoft Word’s readability tool and sampled what I thought were representative pages. The Flesch-Kincaid Reading Grade Level results were: Ontario (p.11) 8.9; British Columbia (p.5) 5.1; and Alberta (p.7) 13.6.

Using a word processing program in this way is mentioned in an excellent document that Sue Rice discovered. I encourage any one, any profession, to read it:

“Writing for Self-Represented Litigants: A guide for Maryland’s courts and civil legal services providers” available at:

2. The URL experience

Occasionally I’d come across a broken link within a recommended website. Not at the top-level domain.

This is not surprising! We see on-screen resources, but not how many (or few) human resources are dedicated to website maintenance.

An example: Student Legal Services of Edmonton. It’s listed as an additional resource. From http://www.slsedmonton.com/where-to-start/
The hyperlink “Will my criminal record stop me from entering other countries?” no longer works.

This domain resolves itself—the hyperlink still works. I mention this because some people are lost if a URL does not “switch over” automatically. They don’t know the difference between the location bar and the search bar in browsing software. They unwittingly start “searching” Yahoo or Google to find their document, and soon end up way off course from officially-sanctioned information. I’ve seen this, many times, at the public library.

I have a few other comments on on-line searching, again coming from the place of a public librarian.

a. Alberta: knowing where to access an official copy is very important. I try to find reputable and free resources. I don’t encourage using public library computers to purchase items. So I was confused by the Alberta’s Queen’s Printer website. Laws Online appeared to be only where you could purchase a copy of the laws.
b. Ontario: when I go onto E-Laws and find the Rules of the Small Claims Court, it is under “Courts of Justice” - not under “Rules” or “Small Claims”. This is confusing. People who are not legally trained – myself included - always have the nagging feeling that they are not where they need to be - unless they are explicitly shown/directed.

c. British Columbia: at the Supreme Court of B.C. website’s I felt unsure about the relationship between the Justice Education Society and the related organizations listed in the pull-down menu. How are these organizations working together? Who is in charge of the material? I think it’s wonderful material - but I want to be secure in knowing that what I reach for a source it has been sanctioned by the courts/relevant authorities. Remember a SRL is quickly accessing the website with no background into the hierarchy.

3. Does the material use accessible and easily understood language? Does it avoid jargon or technical terms?

ALBERTA—

Page 1: “on October 1, 2005 Alberta’s new Family Law Act will come into effect”. So it’s dated.

Page 2: —a significant ambiguity—“Lawyers are required to discuss the different ways of resolving family matters.” This could mean:
1.) You must use a lawyer in order to proceed, or 2.) If you hire a lawyer, they must discuss with you the ways of resolving family matters.

Page 4: “adult interdependent partner” this term is used in a few other places, what does it mean, perhaps common-law marriage? Possibly needs defining.

Page 4: “Parents...may apply to either the Provincial Court or the Court of Queens’ Bench... What is it difference, why are there two locations. Possibly needs explaining.

Page 5: (referring to division of property)
Terms: “trust law” “unjust enrichment” “adult interdependent partners”
A sentence that probably could be worded easier: “Support orders and agreements will bind the estate of the paying person.”
A possibly ominous paragraph about DNA testing refusal: “...the court can draw any inference considered appropriate to establish the parentage of a child.” “Drawing an inference” is a mental activity but as a verb “draw” can mean extract, as in: “draw blood”.

Page 6: Who is a guardian -- an example of something perhaps better illustrated by a chart versus a paragraph.

ONTARIO:

Page 4: Unclear term “endorsement record”
It’s helpful that portions of the Rules are reproduced and aligned with the topic and that there is a chart for serving documents.

Page 5: Annoying that you will have to refer to another document for fees. At least I think it’d be good to get some idea of what copy fees (or any other legal fee) might be, for example, “as of March 22, 2013 copy costs are 10 cents per page”. Okay the price may have gone up but you would have an idea of what to expect.

Page 7: Along those same lines, this section talks about affidavits being “sworn’ before a variety of eligible individuals. But is doesn’t tell you what these individuals actually “do” (do they have a unique stamp?) so that you would know that they are legitimate. This section also doesn’t mention everything that you might need to do to obtain the sworn document —it does state that you show them your unsigned document, but do you have to have government or other I.D. to prove who you are? I have had many questions about notary services at the library.

There is probably a clearer way to say the following:
“The affidavit must be signed in the presence of the person before whom it is sworn” and “NOTE: It is a criminal offense to knowingly swear a false affidavit.”

BRITISH COLUMBIA

Page 1: Unlike Ontario’s material, BC doesn’t show portions of it’s rules, it just names them “Part 8 of the rules” is that the same thing as Rule 8?

Page 2: Term—“Master in Court” what is this, how does it differ from a judge. Why are there two names for judges?

Page 2: “The registry staff may be able to help you determine whether a judge or master should hear your application”. Would they then be giving legal advice? Or is this considered legal information?

Page 2: “Remember that preparing for and attending at a chambers application will cost you time and money.” Very vague—is there a ballpark figure (minimum?) for how much money, how much time?

Page 3: Term “draft order”. This idea shows up written in various ways, all of which probably allude to the same thing: eg “draft of the proposed order”, “attach a draft of the order”, and “use this to draft your order” - using it as the same part of speech each time would be better.

Page 5: “Your application record must contain an index”. An example would be helpful.

Page 7: "You should request costs in the event that your application succeeds." How? Give better details for anything concerning money or time.

3. Termination, jargon, and consistency within the documents

A glossary for each province is available online at its own website. However for me, it was unnerving to have one computer window open to a glossary and another at the website I needed it for. Or go to the online glossary and search on paper for the term I remembered just seeing and didn’t understand.

It might be helpful to just include the definitions at a document’s outset. This is how literacy materials (early readers) are often structured for children.

“Adult interdependent partners” a term used in the Alberta document shows up on pages 2, 4 and 5 but is finally explained on page 8.

Early on, I was clued into the need for clearly arranged documents in print. It’s a certain kind of crazy when legal papers get out of order. All three guides use page numbering. British Columbia’s footer is exemplary.

4. Unanswered Questions and Reference Points for Further Questions:

Both the Ontario and British Columbia document had a section on affidavits.

I didn’t read in either that a person needs I.D. As a librarian in a community with a large immigrant population, I have noticed that many people do not understand the requirements for obtaining a sworn document. Critical procedures need to be made really clear for laypeople. What you need /who you need/ when are they available?

The British Columbia document covers part of the affidavit process on page 4 and referred me to a subsequent document for more information on page 5. Whenever possible I’d suggest building redundancy within documents to help with possible unanswered questions. People will not necessarily read things in order, and certainly not each time they consult them. Nor might they have them all present each time. Redundancy is not boring, it’s reassuring.

The British Columbia document page 2, mentions that a court application will “cost time and money”. It is meant generally to imply what’s ahead, no doubt. Page 3 suggests people to visit a chamber hearing and/or to contact the registry for details.

Page 7 instructs people to request costs in their application record. However no details are given on how to do this here.
I would have liked to have seen money and time issues more concretely addressed in all these documents. From how much legal professional might charge for doing something, to the copy costs at the courthouse, to when would be a good time to observe court sessions. Practical information given alongside legal information, in the same place, makes it easier to prepare mentally and physically (and fiscally).

Report of the Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project
Acknowledgments

Listening to Ontarians: Report of the Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project is the report of the project Steering Committee. The members of the project steering committee are:

- R. Roy McMurtry – Chair
- Marion Boyd – Bencher, The Law Society of Upper Canada
- John McCamus – Chair, Legal Aid Ontario
- Lorne Sosin – Vice Chair, Pro Bono Law Ontario

The Steering Committee wishes to extend thanks to the governing boards of the project partner organizations: The Law Society of Upper Canada, Legal Aid Ontario and Pro Bono Law Ontario for supporting, financially and with resources, this project.

Specifically, acknowledgment goes out to the staff of the partner organizations who participated in the project staff working group:

- Josée Bouchard, Equity Advisor, Law Society of Upper Canada
- Marisha Roman, Aboriginal Initiatives Counsel, Law Society of Upper Canada
- Aneurin (Nye) Thomas, Director, Strategic Research, Legal Aid Ontario

The Steering Committee extends special thanks to Lorne Sossin for his contributions, beyond the call of duty, to this report.

Further acknowledgments are extended to the Law Foundation of Ontario, which provided financial support for this project.

This project could not have happened without the participation of many individuals and organizations, throughout Ontario, including,

- Community Legal Education Ontario (CLEO), which provided a forum for the project partners to test questions in October 2008, and the representatives of the legal and social service organizations who participated at that forum, Learn, Grow, Connect: practicing community legal education in a diverse Ontario;
• Environics Research Group, the consultants that undertook the quantitative and qualitative research for this project and provided the analysis of that research, which forms the backbone of this report.

Specific thanks go out to:
• Derek Leebosh, Senior Associate, and his team;
• the people of Ontario who participated in the telephone survey;
• the numerous representatives of legal and social services organizations, and the lawyers and paralegals who participated in the focus groups; and
• the members of the public who volunteered their time to talk about their experiences with Law Help Ontario in the focus groups.

All data used in the charts and tables in this report were provided by Environics Research Group.

Report of the OCLN Project

Executive Summary
Most people agree that access to justice is a fundamental right in a democratic society. It is important to examine barriers that Ontarians with civil legal needs may be facing when they seek legal assistance to access the justice system. This report is intended to provide an overview of civil legal needs, examine how those needs are being met, identify gaps, and to suggest strategies for addressing those gaps.

The Law Society of Upper Canada, Legal Aid Ontario, and Pro Bono Law Ontario share a common goal to improve access to justice for Ontarians. All three organizations already have in place a comprehensive range of programs and services designed to provide legal assistance to low and middle-income residents with a civil legal issue. Those services are heavily utilized. Until now, there has been no empirical data on how well those services are received, where there are unmet civil legal needs, and if existing resources could address those needs more effectively.

The three organizations agreed in 2008 to undertake a joint research project to identify and quantify for the first time the civil legal needs experienced by low and middle-income Ontarians. The research has three phases: a phone survey to assess quantitatively the civil legal needs, a series of focus groups with front-line legal and social service providers to identify gaps and areas for collaboration, and a mapping exercise to show the availability and range of existing services. The first two phases are now complete. This report contains the findings of the first two phases, which are focused on civil legal needs. The third phase, devoted to mapping the supply of legal services, will be completed in the fall of 2010.

The three partners agreed that the research results are intended to provide a baseline of reliable data about civil legal needs in order to inform planning and priorities in their ongoing response to civil legal needs. The partners’ hope is that this study serves as a catalyst for further collaboration, coordination and innovation to ensure access to justice for all Ontarians.
Accessing the justice system

This study underlines the need to help people demystify the justice system. For the hundreds of thousands of Ontarians who need help with a civil legal issue, the system is poorly understood or perceived to be inaccessible by many. By exploring the civil legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians through a comprehensive research project, there is now for the first time a body of empirically sound data available for all to study and to use. Legal service providers, legal associations, social agencies, government and members of the justice system will all find in this report a thorough examination of the kinds of legal needs that arise among low and middle-income Ontarians, how they try to resolve those needs, and where resources could be better utilized.

Civil legal needs are a pervasive and invasive presence in the lives of many low and middle-income Ontarians. One in three low and middle-income Ontarians have had a non-criminal legal problem or issue in the past three years and one in ten has had multiple legal problems. Overall, almost four in ten people who had experienced a legal problem and sought assistance in the last three years reported that they were still working to resolve their most important problem.

The disruption that results in the daily lives of Ontarians when their civil legal needs cannot be met is significant. Unmet needs often cascade into greater problems for individuals and their families.

Civil legal issues include child custody disputes, wrongful dismissal, eviction from housing, powers of attorney, personal injury, and consumer debt. Resolving these issues can involve the courts, administrative tribunals, and regulatory bodies. The very complexity of the legal system itself can be a barrier to access to justice.

Satisfaction with existing services

People are generally very satisfied when they get assistance from private lawyers and other professionals in the civil legal system. Almost 70 per cent of low and middle-income Ontarians who have experienced a civil legal problem in the last three years sought legal assistance from a lawyer whom they paid. Eighty per cent of those people stated that they found the assistance helpful.

The programs and other services provided by the Project partners are well received by those who access them. These are significant strengths in Ontario’s civil justice system. They provide a valuable foundation for the way ahead.

A significant challenge is to find ways to encourage more people to receive the full benefit of the existing resources available to them. People often can’t find legal help because they don’t know where to look, or because they perceive they won’t be able to afford it. The study reveals, however, that fully half of the low and middle-income Ontarians who had civil legal needs were able to access free help or to resolve their legal problems for less than $1,000 in legal service fees.

One size does not fit all

The study reinforces the necessity of differentiating the needs of low and middle-income earners. There are vulnerability issues among many low-income Ontarians that compound the disruption and challenge created by a civil legal need. The specific legal issues are often different for the two groups. Middle-income Ontarians anticipate the need for legal assistance with wills, powers of attorney, or real estate issues. Low-income Ontarians are more likely to need legal help with disability-related issues, social assistance, personal injury or employment issues. More Ontarians in the lowest income group rely on non-legal sources of assistance for their problems, in particular friends and relatives.

Family law issues were seen by Ontarians across all income ranges as important to resolve. Other civil legal needs, however, can be disruptive and long-standing as well, including employment and personal injury issues. These findings suggest that there need to be multiple, diverse, and integrated access points and service responses.

Addressing legal needs on their own

One in three respondents among low and middle-class Ontarians said they prefer to resolve their legal needs by themselves with legal advice, but not necessarily with the assistance of a legal professional. Legal advice was sought from a variety of sources, both legal and non-legal. In addition, many civil problems are resolved outside the formal justice system.

These responses indicate there are opportunities for the Project partners to broaden access to reliable information and assistance about legal processes and sources of self-help.

The traditional legal service model

Legal service delivery traditionally assumes individual representation and direct legal support from a lawyer or paralegal in a traditional litigation model. More contemporary views augment the traditional model with an appropriate mix of alternative service models and providers based on an assessment of client needs.
The study also reinforces the value in continuing to rethink how legal services are provided to clients. Breaking down legal services into their component parts – or “unbundling” legal services – could in some cases provide clients the option of choosing which parts of a legal issue they resolve on their own and which parts are appropriate for professional help.

Innovations

The study highlights the need for innovation, and recognizes the important innovations which already have been developed. For example, self-help centres allow self-represented litigants to access the justice system even if they cannot afford to retain a lawyer for full representation privately, or qualify for pro bono or Legal Aid. Pro Bono Law Ontario’s pilot project, Law Help Ontario, is a court-based self-help centre which provides a continuum of services based on a triage system that assesses litigant need and allocates resources based on those needs. During the pilot period, the walk-in centre served 6,845 clients, provided over 12,500 brief legal services with the support of over 200 lawyers, who contributed more than 2,100 hours of free legal assistance.

Another resource for those without legal representation is the Lawyer Referral Service (LRS) of the Law Society of Upper Canada. This is a free, public, bilingual service that helps people find a lawyer by providing a toll-free number, with client service representatives who provide the caller with the name and phone number of a local LRS member lawyer who is able to deal with their legal issue. If the person calls the LRS member lawyer, he or she will receive a free consultation of up to 30 minutes. In 2009, 48,329 calls were received by this service.

In addition to in-person self-help centres and referral resources, technology holds significant promise as a platform for the delivery of legal resources. According to the study, 84 per cent of low and middle-income Ontarians are connected to the Internet. The Internet is already an important means to convey legal information and resources. For example, CLEOnet, a project of Community Legal Education Ontario (CLEO), makes available an online collection of legal information and resources produced by community agencies and community legal clinics across Ontario. Technology creates opportunities beyond the transmission of legal information. For example, Law Help Ontario provides access to an online document assembly program that allows litigants to complete their court forms quickly and accurately. A total of 6,536 court forms were generated through this service in pilot period.

The survey revealed that most Ontarians are unaware of the online resources available to them through the Government of Ontario, the Law Society of Upper Canada, Legal Aid Ontario and Pro Bono Law Ontario. Those who did use these resources, however, reported a very high satisfaction rate.

The way forward

The report lays the groundwork for the three Project partners and other members of the legal community to work together in identifying and developing innovative solutions to continue to improve the access to justice for low and middle-income Ontarians. A range of solutions is required. Different people need different types of support based on their unique circumstances. A more vulnerable individual may need the assistance of a lawyer or paralegal while another individual may require access to clear and correct information.
PART ONE
Why are civil legal needs important to all Ontarians?
PART ONE

Why are civil legal needs important to all Ontarians?

The purpose of this report of the Steering Committee of the Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project is to describe and discuss the findings of the needs assessment survey and focus groups undertaken as part of this Project and to chart a path forward for addressing the civil legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians. A separate mapping initiative associated with this Project will focus on the availability of lawyers in various regions of Ontario and will be released separately.

Civil legal needs cover some of the most important areas of the lives of all Ontarians, including their families, their employment, their housing, their immigration and refugee status, and their economic well-being. Our study found that one-third of Ontarians reported having a civil legal need, and the majority of those people experienced disruption of their lives as a result. It may well be that the real number is even higher, as many people who experience a legal problem may not report it as such, either because they are not aware of their rights or because they simply do not identify their situation as a problem. In this sense, people interact with the civil justice system in complex ways. Some rely on the system to protect their rights and interests, while others face significant barriers to accessing the civil justice system. By choice or by necessity, many litigants navigate the civil justice system without legal representation.

Reinforcing these findings, judges have observed the particular difficulty facing low and middle-income communities. As Chief Justice McLachlin has observed,

1 For purposes of this study, we define “civil justice” problems as legal disputes outside the criminal justice context.
Access to justice is quite simply critical. Unfortunately, many Canadian men and women find themselves unable, mainly for financial reasons, to access the Canadian justice system. Some of them become their own lawyers, or try to ... Hard hit are average middle-class Canadians. Those with some income and a few assets may be ineligible for legal aid and therefore without choices. Their options are grim: use up the family assets in litigation; become their own lawyers or give up. The result may be injustice.2

Incidents of injustice that are not redressed may lead to a loss of public confidence in the justice system. One of the most striking findings of this Project’s assessment of civil legal needs is that almost 80 per cent of Ontarians believe that the legal system works better for the rich than for the poor. In a society committed to the rule of law and the principles of equality and fairness, this perception risks eroding public confidence in the justice system.

Another finding of our assessment of civil legal needs is that a majority of Ontarians seek out a lawyer in private practice to help them solve their civil legal problems, and, while they are highly satisfied with the service they receive, they would prefer to solve their legal problems on their own, though with legal advice. This finding alone speaks volumes about what lawyers and other professionals in the civil justice system are doing right, but it also reveals that Ontarians seek to take control of their legal issues themselves. In order to do this, however, they need to have access to reliable and accurate information and advice. This report will identify these types of opportunities – where the service and information providers in the civil justice system can enhance real access to justice for all Ontarians.

What is a civil legal need?

Before we proceed further, some key terms need to be defined. The civil justice system is most commonly understood by what it is not – that is, criminal law. In other words, all the legal needs that fall outside the sphere of criminal justice are grouped together as “civil justice.” This category includes a wide range of legal needs and cuts across matters dealt with by courts, administrative tribunals, and regulatory bodies. It is important to address the myth that civil legal needs, because they are diverse, are somehow less important to people or have less impact on society than criminal legal needs. Disputes over custody of children, wrongful dismissal, eviction from housing, powers of attorney, or consumer debt may affect individuals, families, and communities in deep and lasting ways. The telephone survey carried out as part of the Project revealed that three-quarters of low and middle-income Ontarians who had experienced a civil legal problem in the last three years found their problem to be disruptive to their daily lives.3

A “civil legal need” occurs when an individual or group encounters an issue or experiences a problem that falls within the domain of the civil justice system. The term “civil legal need” incorporates the idea that the problem or dispute someone is experiencing is justiciable (that is, it is capable of being resolved through a legal process).

Who are low and middle-income Ontarians?

This Project examined the legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians, defined for the purposes of this study as those living in households with incomes of $75,000 or less.4

In framing our discussion of legal needs, we must emphasize the importance of distinguishing between the needs of low-income Ontarians and middle-income Ontarians. While the needs of both are critical to access to justice, programs designed for one group may not be appropriate or effective for the other. For example, those who responded to the survey by indicating that they needed legal assistance in real estate transactions were also more likely to have a postgraduate or professional education and household incomes between $40,000 and $75,000.5 By contrast, those who were more likely to mention disability-related issues included those with household incomes of less than $20,000 and members of equality-seeking communities in general.6

Consistent with the approach of distinguishing between low and middle-income Ontarians, civil legal needs may also be considered in the context of vulnerability. For the purpose of this Project, we measured vulnerability by comparing an individual’s experience with a civil legal problem in relation to one or more influential factors. Our quantitative research revealed that the factors that appear to significantly increase a person’s vulnerability include not only income, but also income source, gender, age, membership in an equality-seeking community, geographic location, and the type of civil legal problem encountered. On their own, not only do these factors compromise an individual’s capacity and resources to address a civil legal problem, but they also compound the disruption and challenge created by the presence of a civil legal problem. In combination, their effect is complex.

4 This figure is based on a calculation using the federal government’s Low Income Cut-Off (LICO) amount. This cut-off does not represent a definitive demarcation of low or middle-income earners. It is, rather, a figure we have chosen that is likely inclusive of most low and middle-income earners in Ontario.

For example, 24 per cent of our respondents to the survey were individuals who indicated that they had received income assistance in the last three years in the form of social assistance, housing supplements, child, or income support. This group represented 51 per cent of the Ontarians who earn less than $20,000 per year. In the overall responses to questions throughout the survey, this group is among the groups more likely to identify experiencing a civil legal problem in the last three years, and they are among the groups more likely to mention family relationship problems. They are also more likely to identify their problem as being very disruptive in their lives, to seek resolution for their problem through a court, and to experience problems in accessing legal assistance. They are also among the groups more likely to decide not to seek legal assistance for a problem, even though they believe it would have helped them, and they are among the groups more likely to mention family relationship problems in this context. In the overall survey, family relationship problems stand out as being mentioned most often by low and middle-income Ontarians who have experienced a civil legal problem in the last three years for which they sought legal assistance or for which legal assistance would have been helpful (even though they did not seek such assistance).

7 Equality-seeking communities identified in this survey include the following: Franco-phones, Aboriginal people, people with disabilities, members of racialized communities, gay men, lesbians and bisexuals, and trans-identified persons.

When considering the experience of members of equality-seeking communities – particularly women and persons with disabilities – similar comparisons can be drawn. Women comprised 55 per cent of the survey group, and persons with disabilities comprised 16 per cent of the survey group. In Ontario’s lowest-income group, women comprise 62 per cent of Ontarians who earn less than $20,000 per year, and persons with disabilities comprise 42 per cent of that same group – a strikingly higher representation than in the overall group.

Women were among the groups more likely to identify experiencing a civil legal problem in the last three years – and, in particular, they were among the groups more likely to mention family relationship problems. However, they were more likely than men to say that the process for resolving their family relationship problem was fair and to express strong satisfaction with the outcome. Women were also more likely to identify their problem as being very disruptive in their lives, and they were among the groups more likely to seek non-legal assistance for a legal problem (either civil or criminal) through the police. They were among the groups more likely to decide not to seek legal assistance for a problem, even though they believed it would have helped them, and they were also among the groups more likely to mention family relationship problems in this context.

Although persons with disabilities are not found among the groups more likely to have experienced a civil legal problem in the last three years, they are more likely to identify a civil legal problem they encounter as being very disruptive in their lives. The telephone survey results do not highlight persons with disabilities specifically as a group more likely to experience civil problems related to disability, although the inference is reasonable. While they are also among the groups more likely to mention experiencing problems in accessing legal assistance for their problem, the telephone survey revealed that this group is more likely to seek resolution for a legal problem through a mediator,\(^{28}\) and this group is also more likely to seek non-legal assistance for a legal problem through a government office, Member of Parliament (MP), or Member of Provincial Parliament (MPP)\(^ {29}\).

On the basis of these findings, a number of observations can be made about individuals who have received income assistance and women and persons with disabilities – and how likely they are to experience a civil legal problem such as family relationship issues, as well as the avenues they are likely to choose to resolve their problem. However, these findings do not enable us to draw a definite conclusion about the relationship between factors that increase an individual’s vulnerability (such as income source, gender, or disability) and a particular civil legal need (such as family law) or about why individuals choose legal assistance or not. There are factors that connect these three groups, such as their higher representation among Ontarians earning less than $20,000 per year, and there are also factors that distinguish them individually. More focused information is required.

Although identifying the factors of vulnerability and analyzing their effect on an individual’s experience with a civil legal problem is an involved and complicated process, this information is nonetheless useful and descriptive. Throughout this report, these vulnerability factors are presented, along with the survey responses, to provide context for the results. These factors were also considered seriously by the Steering Committee as it identified the principles and strategies for addressing people’s unmet civil legal needs in the final part of this report (Part Four).

Who are the Project partners?

This Project is a collaborative initiative of the Law Society of Upper Canada (the Law Society), Legal Aid Ontario (LAO), and Pro Bono Law Ontario (PBLO).\(^ {30}\) The Project has also received financial support from the Law Foundation of Ontario.

The Law Society is the governing body of the legal profession (lawyers and paralegals) in Ontario. Its mandate is to regulate the legal and legal services professions in the public interest. In the course of carrying out its function, the Law Society has a duty to act to facilitate access to justice and to protect the public interest.

30 See Appendix B for a brief description of the mandates, missions, and access to justice activities of the three partner organizations.
LAO’s mandate is to “promote access to justice throughout Ontario for low-income individuals by means of providing consistently high-quality legal aid services in a cost-effective and efficient manner.” LAO provides legal aid services to low-income individuals and disadvantaged communities in Ontario for a variety of legal problems, including criminal matters, family disputes, immigration and refugee hearings, and poverty law issues, such as landlord/tenant disputes, disability support, and family benefits payments.

PBLO is the provincial organization dedicated to promoting opportunities for lawyers to provide pro bono legal services to persons of limited means. PBLO provides technical support and strategic guidance to law firms, law associations, and legal departments looking to provide free legal services to persons of limited means and to the community-based organizations that serve them. The organization manages three streams of projects in-house: children’s projects, projects serving charitable organizations, and projects serving unrepresented litigants with civil, non-family matters.

Why it’s important to understand what low and middle-income Ontarians think about civil justice and civil legal problems

The Project partners represent three very different facets of the civil legal system in Ontario. However, they share a common goal: working to enhance access to justice for all Ontarians. This Project was designed in such a way as to receive the opinions of the groups that we believe face the most significant barriers when attempting to solve their legal problems: low and middle-income Ontarians.

We are surrounded by stories of people in our communities who are struggling with an immigration, family law, employment, or consumer debt problem. These are the types of problems that affect most individuals in a very real way. Hearing directly from low and middle-income Ontarians and the legal service and information providers who assist them is an essential step in creating an accessible civil justice system in Ontario.

The tools we used to acquire a picture of the civil justice system in Ontario

The Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project consists of a telephone survey, focus groups, and a mapping initiative. It combines both quantitative and qualitative research methodologies to identify and quantify the “everyday” legal problems experienced by low and middle-income Ontarians – in a comprehensive manner.
How the findings of this study could affect low and middle-income Ontarians and their families

One of the purposes of the Project is to provide a point of departure for each organization (or organizations working in partnership) to design, develop, and deliver innovative new programs within the context of the distinctive governance and mandates of each organization. Our hope is also that the data and analysis presented in this report will provide a catalyst for other organizations to respond to the unmet needs set out in the report and that this report will stimulate further research, dialogue, and initiatives. Ultimately, the goal for the public release of this report is that it will serve as a catalyst for substantive changes and improvements in how low and middle-income Ontarians access the civil justice system and how they resolve their civil legal problems.
PART TWO
What low and middle-income Ontarians told us about their civil legal needs
PART TWO
What low and middle-income Ontarians told us about their civil legal needs

What have we learned about low and middle-income Ontarians, their civil legal needs, their perception of how legal issues are resolved, and their perceptions of the civil justice system?

Through our survey, we learned that more than one-third of Ontarians have had a legal need in the past three years. We also learned that civil legal needs have had a very serious impact on their lives and that this impact differed across income and equality-seeking communities.

An important finding of this Project is that most low and middle-income Ontarians resolved their legal problems with the assistance of a lawyer and that a strong majority of this group has been satisfied with the legal assistance received. However, there are certain areas of law where a higher proportion of people have legal problems and where their path to resolving those problems is long, complicated, or expensive or a combination of these three factors.

While many people seek assistance from lawyers, others experience substantial barriers to accessing legal assistance for a number of reasons, including income, language, and geographic access. Access issues are not experienced uniformly. Access is a more significant challenge in some areas of law, such as family law, and within particularly vulnerable communities, such as with members of equality-seeking communities. A combination of factors that increase vulnerability will also have a proportionately greater effect on an individual’s experience with a civil legal problem. Further, civil needs reflect people’s life experiences. For example, older people tend to have more estate law needs than younger people. This information tells us that there are opportunities to respond to unmet legal needs with more tailored legal services.

When asked to discuss trends in access to justice for low and middle-income Ontarians, both clients and providers of legal services stated that they believed demand for civil legal services is growing but that resources to support those services are limited. This report will include a discussion of how to understand and prioritize resources, and it will suggest potential means to better meet demands within the limits of those resources.

While this Project aims to enhance the Project partners’ understanding of the diversity of civil legal needs in Ontario, we recognize the limits of this study as well. The study does not capture the civil legal needs of all (for example, the homeless cannot be reached reliably through a telephone survey). Nor does this study attempt to address the complex range of dynamics that arise when the legal needs of particular groups, such as Aboriginal communities, are examined. That said, this report, when used in combination with other needs assessment techniques, will contribute to a comprehensive picture of civil legal needs in Ontario that should help policy makers, advocates, and service providers at every level of the justice system in Ontario respond more effectively to civil legal needs.

What are people’s general impressions of Ontario’s civil justice system?

The Project was designed to identify and quantify the “everyday” civil legal problems of low and middle-income Ontarians. We also asked the telephone survey and focus group participants about their perceptions of civil justice and the civil justice system in Ontario.

While the answers to these questions do not provide hard facts, they provide a sense of people’s overall impressions of the civil justice system outside the context of a specific legal problem. They also provide a tool for interpreting people’s perceptions about the fairness of the civil justice system when they consider their individual legal problem. The bulk of the survey questions related to this last issue.

When people were asked whether they thought “the laws and justice system in Canada are essentially fair,” the majority (66 per cent) agreed. Even more people agreed that “courts are an important way for ordinary people to protect their rights” (82 per cent).

When considering access to justice and legal services and costs, most of those surveyed indicated that they believed “the legal system works better for rich people than for poor people” (79 per cent), and respondents were almost evenly split in deciding whether “a middle-income earner can afford to hire a lawyer if he or she needs one” (49 per cent agreed and 46 per cent disagreed).

People were less sure when they were asked whether they believed the following statement: “There are enough free or affordable legal services available if you were in need” (33 per cent agreed, 39 per cent disagreed and 17 per cent did not answer). Similarly, people expressed some uncertainty about whether “you have to be extremely poor to get access to any free legal services in Ontario” (58 per cent agreed, 31 per cent disagreed, and 11 per cent did not answer).

Paralegals have been a regulated legal services profession since 2008. They provide key legal services to many low and middle-income Ontarians, but the Law Society regularly receives questions from the public about the differences between lawyers and paralegals. In order to gauge public awareness about these differences, survey participants were asked whether “lawyers and paralegals provide the same types of legal services.” Respondents were generally uncertain. Thirty per cent agreed, 21 per cent did not know, and 50 per cent disagreed with the statement.31

What are people’s “everyday legal problems”?

Our survey indicated that 35 per cent of low and middle-income Ontarians said they had experienced a civil legal problem or issue in the last three years.32 People mentioned a broad range of problems or issues that caused them or someone in their household to need legal assistance, including problems with a family relationship, wills and powers of attorney, real estate transactions, housing or land, employment, personal injury, money or debt, legal actions, disability-related issues, traffic offences, immigration, and small or personal business issues.33

Those who experience legal problems are generally more vulnerable,\(^{34}\) including those who have received income assistance in the past three years, those not in the workforce, women and members of equality-seeking communities. Individuals born outside Canada and older people are least likely to report a legal problem.\(^{37}\)

Our survey also indicated that certain legal problems have a tendency to cluster, meaning that problems tend to group together. Almost 1 in 10 respondents experienced multiple legal problems.\(^{38}\) The types of problems that cluster most among those with two or more problems include family relationship issues, wills and powers of attorney, housing and land and real estate.

While our survey measured the incidence of legal problems, it is equally important (if not more so) to consider the impact of those problems. A majority of low and middle-income Ontarians believed their legal problems were very disruptive. Three-quarters of those reporting problems said they experienced at least some disruption in their daily lives as a result of their legal problems or issue; significant proportions reported that they experienced stress-related or mental illness, loss of confidence, physical ill health, loss of employment or income, and relationship breakdown.

Those who were more likely to have found their legal problem to be extremely or very disruptive included the following: women, those with household incomes of less than $20,000, members of equality-seeking communities (particularly people with disabilities), those who had received income assistance in the last three years, those with multiple legal problems, and those who did not seek assistance for their legal problems.\(^{39}\) Strikingly, 1 in 7 individuals reported experiencing permanent physical or mental disability.\(^{40}\) These findings suggest a connection between access to justice and broader issues of health, social welfare, and economic well-being.

Our survey also asked people about what they perceived would be their future legal needs. These low and middle-income Ontarians believed that in future they would likely experience legal problems relating to wills and powers of attorney (17 per cent), family relationship (14 per cent), and real estate transactions (12 per cent). Only 21 per cent anticipated that they would not experience legal problems in the future.

What sources of legal information and legal services are available to people?

The sources of legal assistance for low and middle-income Ontarians are almost as diverse as their legal problems, and they often seek assistance from more than one source.

Our telephone survey suggested that, when faced with a legal problem, people most often seek assistance and information from a lawyer in private practice, followed by friends or relatives and the Internet.\(^41\) When actually dealing with their legal issue using legal assistance, two-thirds of the group consulted with a lawyer for whose service they paid. Almost 30 per cent sought some form of legal assistance. Roughly 1 in 5 sought assistance from the Law Society’s Lawyer Referral Service and from a duty counsel each. Approximately 1 in 10 sought assistance from each of a community agency, a pro bono lawyer or program, a telephone advice line, a mediator, or a paralegal.\(^42\)

\(^{42}\) Quantitative Research, supra note 3 at 26.
A striking finding of our survey is that two-thirds of the respondents who sought legal assistance for a civil justice problem engaged a private lawyer themselves. Those who were more likely to have turned to a lawyer they paid for included residents of the outer Greater Toronto Area (GTA) and Hamilton-Niagara, residents in medium-sized cities (10,000 to one million inhabitants), those aged 60 or older, those who had completed some university education, those with household incomes of $40,000 to $75,000, and those who had experienced problems related to wills or powers of attorney or real estate. Among those who sought assistance from a lawyer they paid for themselves, 8 in 10 found this assistance very or somewhat helpful.

Smaller proportions sought assistance from a legal aid service (including a legal aid clinic, legal aid office, or duty counsel) or from the Law Society of Upper Canada’s Lawyer Referral Service. Importantly, of those who received the assistance of a lawyer, the financial burden on those in need varied dramatically. Almost 3 in 10 Ontarians received services pro bono, while another 2 in 10 paid less than $1,000 for the legal assistance they received. Indeed, our survey revealed that only a third of those who retained a lawyer paid more than $1,000.44

Those more likely to have received legal services free of charge included residents of the City of Toronto, those aged 18 to 29, those who had not graduated from high school, those with household incomes of less than $20,000, those who had received income assistance in the last three years, and Aboriginal people.45

Respondents most likely to have paid more than $1,000 for their legal services included residents of Niagara-Hamilton and the GTA; people aged 45 to 59; people who earned more than $40,000; members of racialized communities; people with real estate, legal action, immigration, or consumer issues; people with multiple legal problems; and people who found their problems extremely disruptive.46

THE DEPTH AND IMPACT OF CIVIL LEGAL NEEDS IN THE AREA OF FAMILY LAW

Family law is an issue common to both low and middle-income earners.

Of the various problems for which respondents sought legal assistance, the statistics for family law stood out. Of those surveyed who indicated they had experienced a family law problem, 81 per cent sought legal assistance, and 30 per cent of that group indicated they had difficulty obtaining that legal assistance.

While both the incidence and impact of family law is troubling, the dilemma for service providers is how to address family law needs while still delivering effective programming to help address equally important legal needs (such as those relating to employment, housing, consumer debt and estates issues).

How do people try to solve their civil legal problems?

The majority of low and middle-income Ontarians solve their legal problems by seeking out a lawyer. In terms of resolving their civil legal problems, about the

When they were asked how they would prefer to resolve their legal problem, low and middle-income Ontarians in general were most likely to indicate that they would prefer to resolve a legal problem by themselves, though with legal advice (34 per cent); smaller proportions indicated that they would prefer a legal problem to be resolved through an informal process such as mediation (22

While our focus is primarily access to legal assistance, we recognize that non-legal assistance may often be as important in resolving legal problems. The source of non-legal assistance most often relied upon was that of friends and relatives. Those most likely to seek assistance from friends and family represented a very wide spectrum of people, but some patterns emerged. Vulnerable groups tended to use this source of non-legal assistance the most.51 The sources of non-legal assistance seen as most helpful by those who used them were support groups and spiritual or religious organizations.52

For more than a quarter of the respondents to our survey, the Internet represents a significant source of legal information and assistance. Internet penetration is relatively high among low and middle-income Ontarians, with 84 per cent having access to the Internet at home, work, school or somewhere else.\(^{53}\) While some groups remain more likely to be “unwired” – for example, 40 per cent of those who are 60 years of age and older have no regular access to the Internet – for those under 30 years of age, a remarkable 97 per cent have access to the Internet, and the rate remains high in rural and northern communities and among Aboriginal peoples.\(^{54}\) Among those who sought self-help through the Internet, almost 9 in 10 found this assistance to be at least somewhat helpful.

Those most likely to seek assistance through the Internet were a varied group of people, but the following sub-groups stand out: residents of the GTA; men; those with at least some university education; and those with employment, discrimination, harassment, or consumer issues.\(^{55}\) This finding is of particular interest when we compare it to the results of our focus group sessions. In the focus groups, legal and social service providers caution that the Internet is useful as a source of legal information only for individuals who have access to a private computer and sufficient computer literacy and knowledge of legal issues to be able to interpret the information provided. The telephone survey did not provide us with data as to whether the information people found on the Internet was accurate. It only indicated that they found it helpful.

The Project partners themselves provide online legal information resources to assist all Ontarians. The survey revealed that most Ontarians are unaware of the online resources available to them through the government of Ontario, the Law Society of Upper Canada, LAO and PBLO. Specifically, they were asked about their familiarity with the Ministry of the Attorney General’s Justice Ontario website (www.attorneygeneral.jus.on.ca/english/justice-ont/), the Law Society website (www.lsuc.on.ca), the Law Society’s Lawyer Referral Service site (www.lsuc.on.ca/public/a/faqs/---lawyer-referral-service/), the LAO site (www.legalaid.on.ca), and PBLO’s Law Help Ontario (www.lawhelpontario.org). Although only 1 to 8 per cent of those surveyed had heard of any of the websites, their satisfaction levels were very high (81 per cent and higher).\(^{56}\)

Overall, those most likely to have accessed the websites tended to be residents of Toronto, the GTA or Eastern Ontario, and were people who have experienced a legal problem in the last three years (whether they had accessed assistance or

They also tended to have had multiple legal problems, to have had at least some university education, and to be under 30 (with the exception of the Law Society websites which tend to attract people aged between 45 and 59). Some patterns were found linking familiarity with the site and the type of legal problem experienced. People with an immigration law problem were more likely to use the LAO website. Those with money or debt problems were more likely to use the Justice Ontario website and the Lawyer Referral Service.

What are the most difficult problems for people to resolve, and how long does it take to resolve those problems?

Our survey suggested that some kinds of legal problems or issues are more likely to be resolved than others. For example, problems involving housing or land and wills or powers of attorney were the most likely to be resolved within one year. Problems involving employment, money or debt issues, personal injury and family relationship were the least likely to be resolved within a year. Furthermore, personal injury and family relationship problems were identified as the problems most likely to remain unresolved for three years or more. For people with employment problems, just over 1 in 2 were still working to resolve their problem. A similar proportion of people whose problems involved personal injury were also still working to resolve them. Most also had household incomes of less than $20,000 or had received income assistance in the last three years.

What people told us about the resolution process for their civil legal problems

Low and middle-income Ontarians who sought legal assistance gave the highest rating in terms of fairness to the resolution process for real estate, wills and powers of attorney problems. This group was also most likely to express satisfaction with the outcomes of their experiences with these issues.\(^65\) People who had sought legal assistance for problems related to family, employment and personal injury (which, coincidentally, represent some of the most adversarial types of proceedings) reported that they felt the resolution process should be rated lowest in terms of fairness.\(^66\) Overall, of those people who had experienced a will or power of attorney problem in the last three years, 53 per cent described the resolution process as very fair, and 72 per cent were very satisfied with the outcome.\(^67\) For real estate problems, 50 per cent found the resolution process very fair;\(^68\) and 66 per cent of low and middle-income Ontarians were very satisfied with the outcome.\(^69\) For family relationship problems, 13 per cent of people found the resolution process very fair.

Overall, roughly 1 in 7 Ontarians who had experienced a civil legal problem in the past three years recognized that they needed legal assistance but did not seek any.\(^70\) Within this group, those with the lowest incomes, people living in Central Ontario and the outer GTA, women, members of equality-seeking communities, and those who had received income assistance in the past three years had not sought legal assistance.\(^71\) For most people in this category, the admitted barrier was the perceived high cost of a lawyer.\(^72\)
Those most likely to cite cost or inability to afford a lawyer included people living outside of the GTA and particularly residents of Eastern Ontario; women; middle-aged people; and those with legal problems related to wills and powers of attorney, real estate, housing, or land issues. Almost 1 in 10 low and middle-income Ontarians indicated that they did not seek legal assistance for their civil legal problem because they believed they would not qualify for legal aid or free legal assistance. Those most likely to take this position were members of equality-seeking communities in general and people with family relationship issues.

Where people reported that they had legal problems for which they did not seek legal assistance, the types of civil legal problems covered a broad range of legal problems. However, one-quarter of respondents reported that they had family relationship issues, and roughly 1 in 10 reported employment and housing or land problems. People who did not seek legal assistance for their family relationship problems were most likely to be women, younger people, those born in Canada, those who had received income assistance in the last three years, or those with postgraduate education. People who did not seek legal assistance for employment problems tended to live in Southwestern Ontario, to have at least some university education, or to be Francophones. People who did not seek legal assistance with housing or land problems tended to live outside the GTA, have household incomes of between $20,000 and $40,000, or to be gay, lesbian, or bisexual.

Do people’s civil legal needs differ depending on their income level?

While our survey focused primarily on people with household incomes of less than $75,000, the results gave us an opportunity to determine whether differences exist between the legal needs, the path to resolution, and the perception of fairness in the civil legal system for the most vulnerable people in the lowest income category. For the purpose of this analysis, we focused on the responses of people who were earning less than $20,000 per year.

Among the lowest income earners, a significantly higher proportion were women (62 per cent) as compared to the representation of women in the overall survey group (55 per cent). People in the lowest income category were more likely than other low to middle-income Ontarians to be single, divorced, or widowed. They were more likely to be members of equality-seeking communities – particularly persons with disabilities. They were also more likely to be unemployed or retired or to be receiving disability benefits – and almost half were receiving income assistance.

While the rate of incidence of legal problems within this group was consistent with Ontarians in the total survey group, people earning less than $20,000 were most likely to report a higher incidence of legal problems in certain areas. Family relationship problems remained the top problem. Following this were criminal problems, disability-related issues, and welfare or social assistance issues. When asked to predict what their future civil legal problems might be, low-income earners tended to believe that they would experience problems with family relationships (17 per cent, compared with 14 per cent for all respondents). They were less likely to believe that they might have a legal problem with a will or power of attorney (11 per cent, compared to 17 per cent) or real estate (5 per cent compared to 12 per cent).

THE DEPTH AND IMPACT OF POVERTY ON LEGAL NEEDS

Lower-income-earning individuals tended to have more contact with the legal system and government organizations, specifically in the income support context, and they tended to experience more civil legal issues in their lives than higher income groups.85 They also tended to feel their daily lives were disrupted by their civil legal issue, increasing their vulnerability and making them prone to experiencing negative physical and psychological impacts as a result of their civil legal problems.86

Ontarians in the lower income level tended to seek out legal assistance at rates similar to those of people at higher income levels, but they sought advice from a legal clinic at much higher rates (53 per cent87 compared to 28 per cent88). One-quarter of people earning less than $20,000 did not seek legal assistance, but a higher percentage of this group believed they would have benefited from legal assistance as compared to the percentage of the total survey group who believed they would have benefited from legal assistance.89

More Ontarians in the lowest income group relied on non-legal sources of assistance for their problems – in particular, friends and family (31 per cent 90 compared to 25 per cent in the overall survey group91). More Ontarians in this income bracket also reported a higher rate (15 per cent) of problems in accessing legal assistance and double the rate of incidence among people earning between $40,000 and $75,000.92 In spite of this, the reasons they cited were consistent with the reasons cited by people with higher incomes. One-quarter of the lowest-income earners believed that the cost of legal assistance was a barrier to accessing services,93 compared with 42 per cent of the overall survey group.94

In dealing with their legal problems, a higher rate of Ontarians in this group reported that their problems disrupted their daily lives (85 per cent compared to 71 per cent for higher-income earners).95 Further, they were two to three times more likely to report experiencing another personal issue because of a legal problem than Ontarians in higher income brackets.96

What are the legal services and legal information options that people believe are working well now?

People indicated that they sought legal assistance for their civil legal needs from a variety of sources. Lawyers in private practice were consulted most often for legal assistance in the last three years, and satisfaction levels were also highest with lawyers (81 per cent satisfied).97 Legal clinics and Legal Aid Ontario offices were consulted for legal assistance by roughly 1 in 3 low and middle-income Ontarians, and within this group, satisfaction levels were also high (66 per cent).98

One in 5 people who required assistance used the Lawyer Referral Service of the Law Society, and three-quarters of this group expressed satisfaction with the service. Almost one in five people (18 per cent) sought legal assistance from duty counsel (lawyers who provide services free of charge at courts). Almost three-quarters of those who used this service were satisfied with the legal assistance they received.

The highest levels of satisfaction with legal assistance were expressed by people who received help from a pro bono lawyer or program (84 per cent), although the number of people who accessed the service was roughly 1 in 10 (13 per cent). The same proportion of people accessed legal assistance through a community advocate or agency, and 7 in 10 expressed satisfaction with that service.

One in 10 of low and middle-income Ontarians who sought legal advice in the past three years turned to a paralegal. The majority (62 per cent) expressed satisfaction with the service they received. People most likely to have turned to a paralegal were residents of the GTA, Hamilton-Niagara and Eastern Ontario; people who had received income assistance in the last three years; members of equality-seeking communities; and those who had experienced a problem related to immigration.

ENHANCING PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN LAWYERS AND PARALEGALS

Our Project revealed that when people accessed information and services provided by the Project partners, they were satisfied with the services they received. The challenge is to find ways to encourage more people to rely on the existing resources that are available to them. This process will involve re-examining how best to communicate and interact with the public. It will also involve supporting the lawyers and paralegals who provide essential services to Ontarians.

One such measure that could enhance the public’s confidence in Ontario’s lawyers and paralegals, as well as providing support to these two groups, is a compulsory continuing professional development (CPD) program. In February 2010, The Law Society of Upper Canada approved a CPD requirement of 12 hours per year for practising lawyers and licensed paralegals who provide legal services, to come into effect January 1, 2011. According to Law Society Treasurer W. A. Derry Millar, “The introduction of the CPD requirement confirms both the Law Society’s commitment to regulation in the public interest and the commitment of lawyers and paralegals to providing the highest level of service to clients.”

This program is also in effect in other Canadian provinces, including British Columbia, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec. As part of such a program, lawyers are required to undertake a minimum number of hours of continuing professional development and legal education each year or in a stated period of years. The goal of the program is to enable the regulatory bodies to ensure that lawyers maintain their competency and commitment to lifelong learning throughout their legal careers. It recognizes that the law is dynamic and that individuals who provide legal services must be aware of, and keep pace with, ways in which the law develops.

The Law Society also supports lawyers and paralegals in their professional responsibility obligations with respect to civility. Initiatives of Law Society Treasurer W. A. Derry Millar, taken in response to public reports, included the development of civility protocols for reporting instances of incivility in courts, and the Civility Forum, a series of province-wide meetings from November 2009 to February 2010 to discuss the challenge of civility in the profession.

One in 10 people accessed legal assistance through a telephone advice line in the last three years, and approximately 7 in 10 expressed satisfaction with the service they received. The same proportion of people used the services of a mediator, but in this case, fewer than 6 in 10 expressed satisfaction with the service they received.\textsuperscript{107}

More than 1 in 5 indicated that they used other sources of legal assistance, including lawyers, court clerks, the Internet, employers, counsellors, and the Yellow Pages. The satisfaction rating for these other sources was more than 80 per cent.\textsuperscript{108}

Survey participants were also asked to identify all the sources of information or assistance that they sought out in order to try to resolve their legal problem, and the results were similar. Four in 10 sought out a lawyer in private practice (41 per cent), 1 in 3 consulted with friends or relatives (30 per cent), and slightly less than that ratio (27 per cent) sought information through the Internet.\textsuperscript{109} Of all the sources of information that people sought out, private practice lawyers received the highest rating for usefulness (24 per cent), followed by friends or relatives (11 per cent) and the Internet (10 per cent).\textsuperscript{110}

Survey participants were presented with a potential solution for enhancing access to legal services: legal expense insurance. Legal expense insurance is meant to provide coverage for legal accidents, such as loss of employment or a defect in the construction or reconstruction of a house. Most often, it does not cover family issues or criminal issues because of the higher level of risk to insurers.\(^{111}\)

Low and middle-income Ontarians were asked whether they would consider purchasing legal expense insurance if it was available in Ontario, and more than two-thirds of people (67 per cent) said they would not be interested.\(^{112}\) The main reason cited for their lack of interest was that they did not believe they would need it (56 per cent). Almost 1 in 3 believed that it would be too expensive or that they would not be able to afford it.\(^{113}\)

Given the success of legal expense insurance in other jurisdictions and the entrée of new legal expense insurance providers into the Ontario market, this product has potential to enable low and middle-income Ontarians to gain enhanced access to legal services in the future.

What are the barriers that Ontarians see in the civil legal system?

When people were asked to identify the reason why they chose not to seek out legal assistance for a legal problem, by far the main reason that most people (42 per cent) cited was their perception that legal assistance would cost too much or that they could not afford a lawyer.\(^{114}\) Other reasons included the fact that they did not believe they would qualify for legal aid or free legal assistance (8 per cent); they did not think their problem was important enough (6 per cent); pursuing a legal remedy would take too long (5 per cent); and not knowing what to do (5 per cent).\(^{115}\)

Those most likely to report problems accessing legal assistance include residents of Central Ontario, people aged 30 to 59, households with incomes of less than $40,000, members of equality-seeking communities (particularly... persons with disabilities), those who have received income assistance in the last three years, people with multiple legal problems, people who found their problems very disruptive, and those whose problems related to discrimination or harassment.

The survey results also revealed that the people who identified cost as a barrier to accessing legal assistance tended to be residents of Eastern Ontario, people aged 45 and older, university graduates, people who did not seek legal assistance for their legal problems, and those with a problem related to real estate or employment.

People with family relationship problems tended to be more likely to mention not qualifying for legal aid. In addition, people with employment law problems were more likely to say that they could not find a lawyer practising in the area where they needed help.

What do the organizations and people who provide low and middle-income Ontarians with legal services and information say about Ontarians’ everyday legal problems and how they try to resolve them?

In order to round out the picture we acquired from talking with low and middle-income Ontarians directly, the Project also provided us with an opportunity to speak with smaller groups of lawyers, paralegals and legal and social service agency employees from throughout the province. These discussions were conducted as focus groups, allowing participants to speak in detail about their perceptions of the issues facing Ontarians as they try to resolve their civil legal issues.

When asked about the more common problems their clientele encountered, legal aid providers and social service agencies noted the following: family relationship, housing and employment problems, and issues relating to government income support programs. Lawyers tend to provide services to people with consumer and debt problems, as well as family relationship problems (particularly issues relating to custody and child support).

The focus groups also revealed that the lower the income level of an individual, the more “enveloped by the law” a person’s life is. It is the experience of legal service providers that low-income individuals tend to have greater contact with government support programs, and this contact can have far-reaching effects on an individual's circumstances.120

The focus group participants were also asked to identify what they perceived to be the barriers that their clientele faced in trying to resolve their legal issues. Financial barriers were seen as common to both low and middle-income earners. The financial threshold for qualifying for legal aid was seen as too low to help even low-income earners. In addition to actual legal costs, the focus group participants pointed out a number of associated costs of accessing services that their clientele were not generally aware of and therefore not prepared for. Among these costs were those related to transportation, obtaining documentation, trial costs outside of the lawyer's services (such as expert witness fees), and childcare costs (as childcare would sometimes be needed to enable a client to attend hearings and trials). Lawyers pointed out that a middle-income earner will make a choice to pursue a legal action by considering the time it will likely take to resolve the issue and whether the costs of pursuing a claim could outweigh the potential reward.121

The focus groups also identified systemic barriers. The complexities of the legal system, as well as the qualification process for legal aid, were identified as the top barriers for low and middle-income earners, respectively. With specific reference to civil legal issues, legal aid provides very limited coverage for civil legal issues, thereby having the greatest impact on low-income earners in their decision to pursue these types of cases. Further, paralegals are unable to accept legal aid certificates for their services, and this fact limits access to affordable legal services for low-income Ontarians.122

Lack of knowledge about the legal system – and about the resources that are available to support individuals – was identified as another major barrier for both low and middle-income Ontarians. In the case of low-income individuals, lack of knowledge centred on accessing legal aid. For middle-income individuals, lack of knowledge related to accessing affordable legal services and information.

The focus groups identified some of the issues that could exacerbate an individual’s negative physical and psychological reaction to his or her legal issue. Fear of becoming involved in the legal system, particularly for those individuals who had had previous experience with the civil or criminal legal system, acted as a deterrent to resolving legal issues. Intimidation by the court system, embarrassment and fear of stigmatization about having a legal problem, and fear of loss of privacy were further deterrents.

The focus groups identified specific communities and groups that face barriers in the civil legal system, which accords with the description of vulnerable groups above: Francophones, people whose first language is not English or French, members of equality-seeking groups (particularly persons with disabilities), members of racialized communities, people with limited literacy, people living in remote or rural communities (particularly in the North), seniors and women.123

The focus groups were asked to identify future trends in the civil legal process in Ontario. From the perspective of legal service provision, they foresaw that demand would continue to increase, putting additional pressure on their resources and capacity for providing legal services and information. As the Canadian population continues to age, legal issues specific to seniors, including powers of attorney and wills and financial management of estates, will increase – along with the potential for abuse of the elderly. Family legal issues will continue to increase, and economic uncertainty will create further instability in family relationships and in custody and support arrangements in the case of marital breakdown. Self-represented litigants will also likely continue to grow in numbers.

The focus group participants were able to identify measures and initiatives that have potential to improve access to civil justice for low and middle-income Ontarians. For example, restorative justice programs introduced into Aboriginal communities and organizations have resulted in lower incarceration rates in those communities, particularly in the case of youth. Alternative dispute resolution programs in child protection cases are also beneficial to families.

Contingency fees in civil litigation cases create opportunities for people not otherwise able to afford a lawyer’s fees to pursue a civil case. Raising the maximum of Small Claims Court claims from $10,000 to $25,000 will also encourage people to pursue their claims, with or without representation. In addition, the growth of mediation is viewed as a progressive step. Statutory changes in legislation affecting low and middle-income Ontarians will benefit them, with changes to the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal process and the Landlord and Tenant Board. The introduction of external tribunals to Workplace Safety and Insurance Board and Canada Pension Plan proceedings is also seen as beneficial.124

When asked about potential new modes of legal assistance for low and middle-income Ontarians, legal and social service providers were most supportive of holistic service models, where an individual could access both legal and social 123 Qualitative Research, supra note 119 at 8.

124 Qualitative Research, supra note 119 at 9.
services. They cautioned that the mix of services needs to be carefully planned to avoid creating conflicts, particularly in smaller communities.

Another idea that received some positive support involved rethinking how legal services are charged to clients. Breaking down legal costs into their component parts or “unbundling” legal services could be explored to give clients the option of choosing the part(s) of a legal issue with which they need professional legal help. Public education websites and telephone hotlines can provide basic legal information, but legal and social service providers felt that these services cannot replace in-person service.

The focus group also generated ideas for improving the current system. For the most part, these ideas revolved around public legal education, including public self-help courses and public awareness campaigns; the promotion of the services of paralegals, mediation, and alternative dispute resolution; streamlining court processes, including making forms more accessible, providing more duty counsel and introducing case management where it is not currently available; and enhancing legal aid services through awareness campaigns and creating more volunteer student opportunities.

Putting the pieces of the puzzle together: What do Ontarians and the people who provide them with legal services and information agree on about the civil legal system?

The preceding sections of this report presented the results of the Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project’s telephone survey and focus groups. Both studies presented important, but different, pictures of civil legal needs in Ontario, which are summarized below. The implications of our findings will be discussed in more detail in the next section.

Civil legal needs arise frequently in the lives of low and middle-income Ontarians. Our research shows that civil legal needs touch upon fundamental issues and life circumstances, and unresolved civil legal problems often create great personal hardship. Our research also demonstrates that there is an important connection between access to justice issues and broader issues of health, social welfare and economic well-being. This finding highlights the importance of civil justice both to individuals and to Ontario as a whole.

125 Qualitative Research, supra note 119 at 2.
126 Qualitative Research, supra note 119 at 3.
127 Qualitative Research, supra note 119 at 3.
Our research confirms that civil legal needs may occur often but lead to minor inconvenience or they may occur infrequently but lead to devastating consequences. As a result, any system that allocates scarce resources must carefully balance the likelihood of a civil legal problem against its potential impact.

A high proportion of legal needs cluster and cascade. This finding has important implications for service delivery and design. The traditional model of legal services – be it private, publicly funded, or even pro bono – segregates and isolates legal needs into discrete, legally defined categories. Our research demonstrates that the civil justice system should try to break down these barriers and develop integrated or holistic models of service delivery.

Every group of Ontarians experiences civil needs, but the poorest and most vulnerable Ontarians experience more frequent and more complex and interrelated civil legal problems. (According to our survey, this group includes people affected by factors related to gender, age, income and income source, equality-seeking status, geographic location, and the type of legal problem they encounter.) This finding suggests that service models and priorities must be targeted, designed, and delivered to meet the specialized needs of these communities.

Family law issues occur across income ranges and are seen as important to resolve by the people who experience them. However, they are not the only issues people have, and other kinds of problems can be as difficult to resolve (e.g., some of the most disruptive issues and the longest ones to resolve are related to employment and personal injury).
Low and middle-income Ontarians experience many barriers to access to civil justice, including the real and perceived cost of legal services, lack of access to legal aid and lack of access to information and self-help resources. Once again, the poorest and most vulnerable Ontarians experience the greatest barriers. Our survey and focus groups revealed that communities and groups that tend to experience a higher rate of barriers include members of equality-seeking communities (particularly persons with disabilities and people whose first language is neither French nor English), people with limited literacy, people living in remote or rural communities (particularly in Northern Ontario), older people and women. This finding suggests that the civil justice system needs to have multiple, diverse and integrated access points and service responses. It also suggests that strategies should be developed to improve economic and geographic access to lawyers and legal services.

Our research confirms that people often address their legal needs on their own. Indeed, people generally often want to resolve their legal needs by themselves with legal advice but not necessarily with the assistance of lawyers. Service providers and Ontarians also agree that people tend to and want to access legal services and information from a variety of sources, both legal and non-legal, when faced with a civil legal problem. These findings suggest that access to civil justice for low and middle-income Ontarians depends on access to a wide spectrum of sources of legal information and services.

Many civil problems are resolved outside the formal justice system. This suggests that the civil justice system has to help people identify and resolve issues outside the traditional system, including better education, information, improved legal knowledge, skills development and self-help.

Finally, our research confirms that people are generally very satisfied when they receive assistance from private lawyers and other professionals providing services in the civil legal system. This suggests that Ontario is well served by its legal professionals and that any potential proposals to reform the civil justice system must build on the system’s existing strengths.
PART THREE
Finding legal services and legal information
PART THREE
Finding legal services and legal information

Where are legal services and sources of legal information located in Ontario?

The availability of lawyers must be a significant part of any serious discussion about access to civil justice in Ontario. The mapping initiative, which will be released subsequent to this report, will shed light on where and what lawyers practise in Ontario. Needless to say, not all lawyers are the same. And from the perspective of low and middle-income Ontarians, one particular type of lawyer is crucial to ensuring access to civil justice: sole practitioners and lawyers practising in small firms. As a recent report on sole practitioners and small legal firms put it:

When individual citizens in Ontario require the services of a lawyer to handle a wide range of legal matters such as real estate transactions, will preparation, estates work, representation in matrimonial, other civil disputes or criminal proceedings, advice for small businesses, and appearances before administrative tribunals, overwhelmingly they retain (small firms and sole practitioners). (Small firms and sole practitioners) report that 77% of the clients they represent are individuals.¹²⁸

Small firms and sole practitioners also deliver the majority of legal aid and pro bono services across the province. The distribution and sustainability of small firms and sole practitioners is thus crucial in order to respond to the legal service needs of low and middle-income Ontarians.

LAO provides or funds two kinds of civil legal services: poverty law services and family law services. Poverty law services are provided through community legal clinics, while most, but not all, family services are provided through private lawyers acting on legal aid certificates or as per diem duty counsel.

Legal aid is premised on a public-private partnership, in which the private bar is relied upon to deliver the majority of legal aid services across the province. While the number of lawyers working in community legal clinics has increased over 40 per cent between 1999 and 2009, LAO’s management data also confirm that the number of private lawyers willing to provide family legal aid services has declined rapidly. It also confirms that LAO appears to be having trouble regenerating or renewing the family legal aid bar in sufficient numbers to keep the system sustainable in the long run. For example, there was a 29 per cent decrease in the number of private lawyers accepting family certificates between 1999/2000 and 2006/07. In 1999/2000, there were 855 more lawyers providing family legal aid services than in 2006/07. Young lawyers appear willing to take legal aid cases as they establish their practices. As they become more experienced, however, they leave legal aid. In 1999/2000, 855 “new” lawyers accepted family certificate services. By 2006/07, however, only 392 of that group remained, a decline of 46 per cent.

These statistics are dramatic in their own right. It must be remembered, however, that the time period sampled was actually a period when the legal aid tariff increased by 16 per cent across LAO’s three experience levels. Not surprisingly, shortages are already apparent in some locations. Other trends include the following:

- Lawyers appear to be leaving both legal aid and small firms and sole practice.
- The bar providing civil legal services to individuals appears to be “graying.”
- New lawyers do not appear to be participating in legal aid or small firms or as sole practitioners in sufficient numbers.

Once again, it is important to emphasize that many lawyers continue to respond to the civil legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians. Our data and focus groups tell us, however, that in several geographic areas and some practice areas, supply problems already exist or supply is clearly vulnerable. These shortages are important first and foremost because of their potential effect on the families and individuals who are unable to access lawyers in those areas. A single mother who cannot find a lawyer to accept her family legal aid certificate could suffer extraordinary consequences. These situations should also be seen as early warning signs of serious, widespread threats to access to civil justice.
REGIONAL DIFFERENCES IN LEGAL NEEDS

Our Project has confirmed that civil legal needs are not experienced in the same way in all parts of Ontario.

For example, the survey results revealed that the people who identified cost as a barrier to accessing legal assistance tended to be residents of Eastern Ontario, while those most likely to report problems accessing legal assistance included residents of Central Ontario. People most likely to have turned to a paralegal were residents of the GTA, Hamilton-Niagara, and Eastern Ontario.

Of those who reported a civil legal need, the highest proportion of people who did not seek any legal assistance (where such assistance would have been helpful) were residents of Central Ontario and the GTA.

Taken together, our survey and focus groups revealed a number of important insights:

- Many low and middle-income Ontarians experience civil justice legal problems, and those problems have significant impact on their lives.

- Most low and middle-income Ontarians seek out lawyers in private practice for legal information and assistance, and they are generally satisfied with the quality of the services they receive.

- A number of low and middle-income Ontarians are unable to obtain legal information and assistance, nor do they even bother trying, because of cost barriers and the limits of legal aid coverage and eligibility. Many of these people are more vulnerable than those able to obtain a private lawyer.

- A number of Ontarians, especially middle-income groups, wish to solve their legal problems themselves, and they rely on informal networks and the Internet to obtain legal information to do so.

131 Quantitative Research, supra note 3 at 28.
132 Quantitative Research, supra note 3 at 51.
In light of these insights, it is clear that while the traditional model of legal service delivery continues to meet the needs of many, for those unable or unwilling to seek out a lawyer in private practice or through legal aid, models of legal service delivery will have to evolve. In the next section, we explore the ways in which innovation in delivering legal services might address the needs of low and middle-income Ontarians.
PART FOUR

A path for the future: addressing people's unmet civil legal needs
PART FOUR
A path for the future: addressing people’s unmet civil legal needs

The last section of Part Two (“Putting the pieces of the puzzle together”) summarized the important findings of our study. This section will discuss the implications of our findings and offer some general observations and ideas about potential strategies and solutions.

We must emphasize at the outset that we do not believe there is any single innovation or program that will respond to all the unmet civil legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians. There are no one-size-fits-all solutions that will apply to all situations. Rather, our emphasis is on the need to tailor solutions to particular problems, and this may lead to a mix of services and programs working, to the extent possible, in complementary and coordinated ways.

We also wish to reiterate that the responsibility for access to justice transcends organizational boundaries. In the past, access to justice was often considered a legal aid issue. According to a more contemporary view, many institutions must be involved. Access to justice is not a matter that falls within the mandate or capacities of any single organization or institution. As a result, success or failure in addressing the unmet needs identified in this Project may well be determined by success or failure in establishing collaborative initiatives.

Civil legal needs reflect people’s situations and life experiences

Civil legal needs are not static. They change in response to broad, societal factors (e.g., an economic downturn may cause a spike in consumer debt needs) or to factors within the justice system (e.g., a change to the rules of civil procedure or to the substantive areas of law may create new needs, such as the development of class actions and contingency fees).

The telephone survey and focus groups also revealed that legal needs are tied to an individual’s life circumstances. Poor and vulnerable Ontarians often have distinct needs. Middle-income Ontarians often have other needs. And every person’s needs can change as their lives and circumstances change. For example, all Ontarians are hungry for a basic level of knowledge about their legal rights and opportunities for exercising those rights. Not everyone’s informational needs are the same, however. Single individuals have less need of family law legal information and services relevant to married or common-law couples. The legal information required by a New Canadian is in many ways unique to that individual’s particular stage in life as he or she adjusts to settlement in Canada. Those starting initiatives and projects designed to enhance access to civil justice for individual Ontarians should be mindful of the context of the target audience for their information, as this context will affect the content and the delivery mode of the information.

The issue is to understand civil legal needs and to target resources at the various client groups within the Ontario population. This Project provides a picture in time of the perceptions and challenges that various segments of the Ontario community are facing.

Expanding the range and reach of civil legal services

We believe that civil legal services can be made more accessible by rethinking some of the conventional assumptions about the reach and range of civil legal services.

The traditional model of legal service delivery almost inevitably assumes individual representation and direct legal support from a lawyer in a traditional litigation model. More contemporary views of legal service models augment the traditional model with an appropriate mix of alternative service models and providers based on an assessment of the client’s need, the level of complexity of the service required, and the available financial resources. For example, LAO currently spends 95 per cent of its family law resources on individual and/or limited representation. This means that LAO uses a model that presupposes litigation as the principal method of resolving disputes. However, litigation may not be the most effective service for most family disputes and may not be protective of children’s best interests. The modern standard of family justice service consists of early access to information, early assessment of cases, and the diversion of appropriate cases to alternative methods of dispute resolution. While access to lawyers is essential for many Ontarians, especially those with low incomes, for those with clustering or multiple legal problems and those with other issues that make them more vulnerable (especially middle-income Ontarians), access to civil justice means more than access to lawyers and courts.
For example, civil legal needs should be addressed through a variety of service providers, designed with the user’s and the user’s community priorities and needs in mind.

One of the important insights arising from our study is that people are generally satisfied with the legal assistance they find (whether it be a lawyer they pay for, a legal aid lawyer, duty counsel, a pro bono lawyer, a paralegal, or a telephone advice advisor). The challenge is matching people who are now without legal assistance to the kind of assistance they need in more efficient and effective ways. Moving from a static model of legal representation to a broad menu of options for the delivery of legal services will allow more unmet needs to be handled in more efficient and effective ways.

Context matters. A number of studies reinforce the conclusions of this study that the varying capacities of individuals make a “cookie-cutter” approach to legal services untenable. Self-help is a good example. Until the litigant’s capacities (not just understanding of the law but mental and physical health, etc.) and a problem’s complexities are known, it is not possible to determine whether self-help will be effective. Similarly, income cut-offs alone cannot be used to determine the fit of a program to an individual. This is the reason why upfront triage – assessing and prioritizing needs – is so important.

Finally, we should not lose sight of the value of prevention as a means of avoiding civil legal needs altogether. Prevention may be enhanced by better access to legal information (discussed below) or by public policy initiatives such as no-fault insurance schemes or proactive regulation in consumer protection, which remove the need for legal assistance to resolve problems.

Making civil legal services more economically accessible

People do not need, or want, full legal representation to solve every civil legal issue they encounter. In some cases, partial legal and paralegal representation, or “unbundled” legal services, may be the answer. A significant proportion of middle-income Ontarians can afford to pay for some legal services. Developing innovative programs to harness this market, whether through unbundling, legal expense insurance, or other forms of subsidized legal services, would represent an important step forward. For such initiatives to succeed, however, they must be accompanied by public education as to the potential benefits and cost savings associated with these initiatives. For example, while the option of legal expense insurance appears to hold significant promise to reduce cost and broaden access to legal services, our telephone survey revealed that slightly less than one-third (31 per cent) of the participants would have an interest in, or inclination to, purchase legal expense insurance, and over half (56 per cent) did not believe it was needed. This result may indicate a lack of interest in this option or it may demonstrate a lack of understanding of its benefits.

If alternatives to the current retainer system for legal fees are considered, public education will also be a crucial step in ensuring the success of these programs. The telephone survey and the focus groups highlight the public’s perception that legal services are expensive, even though the reality is that almost 30 per cent of Ontarians with a civil legal problem receive legal services free of charge, and almost 20 per cent pay less than $1,000. Options that have been introduced in other jurisdictions include the unbundling of legal fees and block fees for legal services. Research is required to determine whether these types of fee models could work in the Ontario context.

Meeting family law needs

Our Project consistently revealed that family relationship breakdown is the primary reason why most Ontarians enter the civil justice system. The breakdown of a family relationship is also often at the heart of people encountering multiple civil legal problems, and it is at the centre of clustering civil legal problems. Family relationship problems are also among the most difficult, complicated, and time consuming to resolve. This reality translates into making them most disruptive to people’s daily lives and most draining on their resources. Our survey revealed that more than 4 in 10 people (44 per cent) with a family relationship problem had not resolved their problem within three years.

Access to resources in family law in the form of information, legal and social assistance, and resolution of family law problems for low and middle-income Ontarians is a priority issue for the civil legal system. As identified in our Project results, addressing the gap in services and support in family law will require a range of services from all partners in our civil legal system.

Expanding self-help appropriately and creatively

Our data shows that a significant portion of the population has some desire to handle their civil legal problems on their own with legal advice. In 2007, Pro Bono Law Ontario launched Law Help Ontario, a pilot project located at 393 University Avenue in Toronto and funded by The Law Foundation of Ontario. The underlying philosophy of the project is that self-represented litigants have a fundamental right to access the justice system even if they cannot afford to retain a lawyer for full representation privately, or qualify for pro bono or Legal Aid. Law Help
Ontario strives to address self-represented litigants procedural and substantive barriers to justice so they can better navigate the justice system. Specifically, Law Help provides a continuum of brief services based on a triage system that assesses litigant need and allocates resources based on those needs. Law Help is a unique program in North America because it blends the best of self-help models with the best of duty counsel services; and because it leverages the skills of the private bar to deliver services on a pro bono basis. This way Law Help creates meaningful opportunities for lawyers—primarily junior associates—to enhance access to justice and to gain valuable, hands-on, civil litigation experience. During the pilot period, the walk-in centre served 6,845 clients, generated 6,536 court forms, and was supported by over 200 lawyers who provided more than 2,100 hours of free legal assistance.133

Expanding the use of technology

In addition to in-person self-help centres and resources, technology holds significant promise as a platform for the delivery of self-help resources. According to the results of the telephone survey, 84 per cent of low and middle-income Ontarians are connected to the Internet. In spite of Ontarians’ connectivity to the Internet and their desire to access information online to resolve their legal problems, however, there is a low rate of awareness of the sources of legal information that are accessible to Ontarians, specifically with online resources. The telephone survey pointed out that the organizations that serve the public and whose mandate is to provide legal information to the public are not at the top of mind of the public when they are looking for information on the Internet. The focus groups identified the need to ensure that what people access through the Internet is accurate and reliable and that people are directed to those sources.

Technology holds great promise in expanding the reach of affordable legal information, advice and representation. The Law Help centre’s website, for example, logged 144,975 page views during its pilot period.134 The Law Help Ontario website and walk-in centre also offer an automated document assembly program that allows litigants to complete their court forms. During the pilot period, 6536 court forms were generated135 and 95 per cent of users reported that

---

134 Law Help Ontario Report, supra note 133 at 5.
135 Law Help Ontario Report, supra note 133 at 5.
they found it to be a useful service. Technology, though, is not itself a panacea, but rather a means to connecting those in need with service providers. The resources provided through the Law Help Ontario, the Law Society website and Lawyer Referral Service, the Ministry of the Attorney General’s Justice Ontario website, the Legal Aid Ontario website, and other online sources of advice, information, and referrals suggests the potential of the Internet for empowering individuals to engage in self-help. Provided that the websites are accessible, online resources can enable individuals to self-select the right level of legal assistance for their problem. Knowledge of legal issues and computer literacy are two main concerns that must be addressed to ensure that online resources are accessible and useful to individual users.

As providers, platforms and services increase, issues of coordination and coherence are emerging. Any strategy of enhancing access to justice through computer and Internet-based initiatives will have to operate in a collaborative fashion to be effective.

Other options for optimizing online resources include virtual law firms and online brokers of legal services also suggest ways in which the private bar may reach those people in need more effectively. Online resources cannot replace person-to-person exchanges, however. Low and middle-income Ontarians expressed their preference to solve their legal problems on their own with legal advice but when dealing with their actual legal issue, two-thirds of Ontarians seek the advice of a lawyer they pay for.

Telephone legal advice hotlines do not replace the value of a person-to-person exchange when people are seeking out legal advice and information. Access to a telephone and the privacy needed to discuss legal problems may be a barrier to certain people or communities. To be effective, a telephone advice hotline must be more than a pre-recorded message. Staff for hotlines must be competent and provide referrals where appropriate.

As we discussed above, legal problems do not arise in isolation. The telephone survey indicates that people prefer to access legal advice and information from a variety of sources when they are faced with a legal issue. Our focus groups indicated that the overall concept of “one-stop shopping” for social services – including legal advice and assistance – could be efficient and preferable to a legal advice hotline or websites, because of the face-to-face communication possible with such a model.

Educating Ontarians about their legal rights and legal services

Our Project revealed that, whatever informational, self-help, or advice services are available, we must also recognize that in some circumstances, access to a qualified lawyer or paralegal is the only means to a just and fair outcome for many low and middle-income Ontarians. Geographic, linguistic, and economic barriers to accessing lawyers and paralegals may be addressed through a mix of strategies, including the use of subsidized legal services, centralized interpretation and translation services, videoconferencing, and other technological assistance.

Along with access to services, public education about lawyers and paralegals and how their roles differ will enable Ontarians to understand that they have choices when it comes to legal services for their civil legal problems. Regulated paralegals are still a relatively new phenomenon, and according to the telephone survey, people who sought their legal advice tended to be from urban areas, members of equality-seeking communities, and people who had problems related to immigration.

Educating people about basic legal principles so that they can themselves better identify when they have a legal issue will open points of entry to the legal system. For example, the Barreau du Québec has launched public education programming through the public access television network. Programming focuses on basic access to justice issues and legal information. This example highlights that there are many modes of disseminating information to the public, including broadcast media, print media, the Internet, and telephone information lines.

Further, educating the public about the availability of lawyers and paralegals, the services available to people to access them (such as the Lawyer Referral Service and the Law Society’s Lawyer and Paralegal Directory), and the relative costs of retaining their services will enable low and middle-income Ontarians to make informed choices when it comes to purchasing legal services.

More information and working together

Finally, we believe that accessibility to the civil justice system would improve if organizations committed to access to justice committed to sharing information and working together.

The desire to understand the legal needs of the public, how well the legal system in Ontario has responded to those needs, and where the system can work better has inspired a number of research initiatives and reports in recent years, as well as currently. Research is an expensive proposition for an organization and often external funding from public sources is used to augment research budgets.

The data and information that is produced through this research is of utmost importance to the organizations involved, as well as to the Ontario public. Essentially, this data and information belongs to everyone.

Moving forward, formalizing and coordinating the sharing of public data and information could be a cost-effective method of maintaining the check-up on the civil justice system in Ontario. It could also be an avenue to build on the foundation of research in recent years and lay out a path for future projects that can be more specialized or focused on specific groups and communities. As we identified at the beginning of this report, there were a number of sub-groups within our study group that we were not able to reach, particularly members of vulnerable communities. This Project can be a point of departure for other groups to look more closely at the civil legal needs of those groups.

The Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project process
APPENDIX A

The Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project process

A. Steering Committee

The Project’s Steering Committee consists of three individuals (Marion Boyd, Lorne Sossin, and John McCallum) representing the three participating stakeholders (the Law Society, PBLO, and LAO) and chaired by former Attorney General and former Chief Justice of Ontario, R. Roy McMurtry. The Steering Committee provided direction and oversight for the Project, including

- reviewing the study methodology;
- reviewing guidelines for prioritizing areas of inquiry and the allocation of resources;
- providing advice on the selection of third-party consultants;
- providing advice on the work of third-party consultants and providing oversight for the consultants’ activities;
- providing oversight for study expenditures; and
- reviewing and approving the study’s findings and final report.

B. Staff working group

Senior staff from the three participating organizations assembled the background material, supervised the conduct of the survey and focus groups, coordinated work on all aspects of the Project, and provided general administrative and logistical support to the Steering Committee.

C. Environics

After a competitive search, Environics Research Group (“Environics”) was commissioned to undertake the empirical aspects of the civil legal needs study. In June of 2009, Environics conducted 2,000 22-minute telephone interviews... among low-income and middle-income Ontarians (defined as households with a combined income of less than $75,000). Survey participants were asked a comprehensive list of questions to determine whether they had experienced a problem with a legal dimension, what they did to resolve the problem, and how the problem affected them. Participants were also asked to provide basic socio-demographic information so that types or “clusters” of legal problems could be compared with broader categories of social need.

Environs also conducted a series of focus groups with front-line legal and social service providers. Additional focus groups were conducted involving unrepresented litigants who were users of PBLO’s court-based self-help project. This research consisted of three in-person focus groups conducted in Toronto, Hamilton, and Ottawa, as well as four telephone focus groups conducted among residents of Central and Eastern Ontario, Southwestern Ontario, Northern Ontario, and the outer GTA. All groups were conducted between June 25 and July 16, 2009, among front-line legal and social service providers, including lawyers, paralegals, and representatives of social assistance services and legal aid clinics.

Recruiting guidelines were developed to ensure that each group was composed of a mix of legal and social services professionals. The participants were recruited from lists of legal and social service professionals in each region provided by the Project partners.

D. Mapping exercise

The Project also includes an Ontario-wide environmental scan or “mapping” exercise, to identify the number, type, range, and location of access to justice programs and initiatives (both private and public) directed toward low and middle-income Ontarians. By contrast, our first two Project phases, the telephone survey and focus groups, analyzed the legal needs of low and middle-income Ontarians. In other words, these Projects analyzed the demand for civil legal services. The mapping exercise will look at the supply of legal professionals available to meet those needs and the capacity of the existing legal services delivery system to meet the needs of low to middle-income Ontarians. Specifically, the mapping exercise (the results of which will be released separately from this report) will identify the number, type, range, and location of legal professionals across Ontario. “Mapping” research is important because it allows policy makers to identify geographic areas or areas of law that may be 138 Results of the telephone survey are considered to be accurate to within plus or minus 2.2 percentage points, 19 times out of 20.

underserved or at risk. It also allows policy makers to make strategic decisions about how and where to prioritize resources.

The Ontario Civil Legal Needs Project is by no means the first organization to tackle this issue. The Law Society, the Ontario Bar Association, the County and District Law Presidents’ Association (CDLPA), LAO, and the Law Foundation of Ontario have taken important steps in this regard. Much of our analysis and many of our recommendations in this area will build upon these efforts.
APPENDIX B

Organizational profiles of the Law Society of Upper Canada, Legal Aid Ontario, and Pro Bono Law Ontario

LAW SOCIETY OF UPPER CANADA (LAW SOCIETY, LSUC)

Mandate of the Law Society
Founded in 1797, The Law Society regulates Ontario lawyers and paralegals in the public interest. The Law Society ensures that these individuals,

• are licensed and insured
• are qualified to help their clients through the legal process
• meet standards of learning, competence and professional conduct.

Licensed paralegals can represent clients in the following types of matters:

• Litigation in Small Claims Court
• Traffic and other offences heard in Provincial Offences Court
• Hearings before tribunals (e.g. the Landlord and Tenant Board or the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board)
• Minor criminal charges under the Criminal Code heard in the Ontario Court of Justice.

Lawyers can help with all types of legal matters, including the following:

• Family matters, such as divorce, separation agreements and custody issues
• Criminal matters at all levels of court
• Civil litigation matters at all levels of court
• Wills, powers of attorney and estate matters
• Real estate matters, including buying and selling residential or commercial property
• Administrative law matters, including hearings before tribunals.

Finding a Lawyer or Paralegal

The Law Society provides resources to members of the public to assist them in finding a lawyer or paralegal. These resources include,

• the Client Service Centre, which is accessible by telephone, facsimile or email. A TTY line is available to provide access for people who are hearing impaired. Members of the public can make enquiries about whether a lawyer or paralegal is currently entitled to provide legal services in Ontario as well as information about the individual’s discipline history.

• a fully accessible, bilingual website with features to accommodate visually-impaired people.

• an online Lawyer and Paralegal Directory. This directory enables members of the public who know the name of a lawyer or licensed paralegal to locate their contact information and access information about their status in the profession.

• the Lawyer Referral Service (LRS), which is a free, public, multilingual service that helps people find a lawyer. Individuals call a toll-free number and a client service representative gives that person the name and phone number of one local LRS member lawyer who is able to deal with the legal issue. The person calls the LRS member lawyer and receives a free consultation of up to 30 minutes.

• the Law Society’s Certified Specialist program, which is intended to help members of the public identify lawyers who can meet their needs for specialist assistance in complex matters. Specialists are evaluated initially and periodically, and in accordance with specified standards of knowledge, skill, conduct and practice. The program is voluntary, and no lawyer in Ontario is required to be certified as a specialist in order to practise in the area of law covered by that specialty. However, only those certified by the Law Society may refer to themselves as specialists in their advertising, and are included in the Law Society’s Directory of Specialists. The Directory of Certified Specialists is available online and a paper directory may also be requested from the Client Service Centre.

• the Client Service Centre will also provide contact information for Legal Aid Ontario (LAO) and the Law Help Ontario service of Pro Bono Law Ontario (PBLO).
Complaining about a lawyer or licensed paralegal

As the regulator for the legal profession, the Law Society receives and responds to written complaints from members of the public about lawyers and paralegals. Every complaint received is reviewed and assessed. The complaints form is available online through the Law Society website.

Where possible, the Law Society tries to help members of the public and the lawyer or paralegal deal with the issues. Where necessary, the Law Society investigates and takes disciplinary action in appropriate cases. Most complaints are resolved without a formal discipline hearing. Where the Law Society cannot help with a complaint, it tries to assist the individual by providing information about other sources of help.

Facts about The Law Society

- As of 2010, there are approximately 41,000 licensed lawyers in Ontario.
- As of 2010, there are approximately 21,000 lawyers in private practice.
- As of 2010, there are approximately 2,700 licensed paralegals in Ontario.
- The Law Society received the following number of enquiries from the public, lawyers and paralegals for 2009:
  - Call Centre – 249,872
  - Membership Services - 102,567
  - Administrative Compliance – 97,392
  - Complaints Services – 26,100
  - Total – 475,931
- Calls to the Lawyer Referral Service in 2009 – 48,939

A snapshot of a diverse profession

The Ontario legal profession is diverse and increasingly representative of the communities it serves. At the point of entry into the profession, the following percentages of Lawyer Licensing candidates self-identified as members of equality-seeking communities (as of December 31, 2009, unless otherwise noted):

- Women - 51.8%
- Racialized communities – 12.8%
- Francophones – 6.4%
- Aboriginal peoples – 1.9%
- Persons with a disability – 1.9% (as of June 2009)

The Office of the Registrar for the licensing process for both lawyer and paralegal candidates provides accommodations to meet the special needs of candidates through its support services office.
Access to Justice Initiatives
In addition to the Client Service Centre, online resources, the Lawyer Referral Service, the Directory of Certified Specialists, the Public Legal Education Task Force and Pro Bono Law Ontario, the Law Society’s access to justice initiatives focus on helping to make sure the public is well served by the legal system of Ontario. These other initiatives include the following programs:

- Access to Justice Committee
  The Access to Justice Committee is a standing committee of Convocation, the board of governors for the Law Society. Its directive is to develop, for Convocation’s approval, policy options to facilitate access to justice for the people of Ontario, in keeping with the Law Society’s statutory mandate.

- Equity and Aboriginal Issues Committee and the Equity Advisory Group
  The Equity and Aboriginal Issues Committee (EAIC) is a standing committee of Convocation that develops, for Convocation’s approval, policy options for the promotion of equity and diversity in the legal profession and for addressing all matters related to Aboriginal peoples and French-speaking peoples. As part of this policy development process, the EAIC consults with the Equity Advisory Group, Rotiio’ tatries, Association des juristes d’expression francaise de l’Ontario (AJEFO), women and equity-seeking communities. The Equity Advisory Group is a working group of the EAIC, which specifically assists the committee in the development of policy options for the promotion of equity and diversity in the legal profession.

- Equity Initiatives Department
  To ensure access to justice, the Law Society integrates equity and diversity values and principles into its model policies, services, programs and procedures. The Law Society seeks to ensure that both law and the practice of law are reflective of all peoples in Ontario by actively participating with Aboriginal, Francophone and equity-seeking groups, through consultations, meetings and public education activities. The Equity Initiatives Department also provides resources for members of the public and the profession, such as publications and reports.

- Compensation Fund
  The Law Society has two compensation funds for clients who have lost money because of a lawyer or a paralegal’s dishonesty, which are paid for by lawyers and paralegals respectively.

- Discrimination and Harassment Counsel (DHC)
  As part of the Law Society of Upper Canada’s efforts to enable equity and diversity in the workplace and the profession, and to help stop discrimination and harassment, the Law Society provides a Discrimination and Harassment Counsel.
Counsel service free-of-charge to the Ontario public, lawyers and paralegals. The Discrimination and Harassment Counsel confidentially assists anyone who may have experienced discrimination or harassment by a lawyer or within a law firm or legal organization or by a paralegal.

LEGAL AID ONTARIO (LAO)

In 1998, the Ontario government enacted the Legal Aid Services Act in which the province renewed and strengthened its commitment to legal aid. The Act established Legal Aid Ontario (LAO), an independent but publicly funded and publicly accountable non-profit corporation, to administer the province’s legal aid program.

LAO’s mandate is to “promote access to justice throughout Ontario for low-income individuals by means of providing consistently high quality legal aid services in a cost-effective and efficient manner.”

LAO is the second largest justice agency in Ontario. LAO is one of the largest providers of legal services in North America covering a range of legal aid services such as criminal, family, mental health, aboriginal law, clinic law, and refugee law.

LAO operates offices in communities across the province and funds 79 community legal clinics throughout Ontario, including 17 specialty clinics that provide assistance to clients in such areas of law as worker’s compensation, housing, income security, and worker’s health and safety.

Legal aid is available to financially-eligible low-income individuals and disadvantaged communities for a variety of legal problems, including criminal matters, family disputes, immigration and refugee hearings and poverty law issues such as landlord/tenant disputes, disability support and family benefits payments.

LAO provides many access to justice programs and services, including in-house legal services, community legal clinics, duty counsel, Student Legal Aid Services Society and the legal aid certificate program, which gives low-income people access to legal representation from a pool of several thousand private lawyers who undertake legal aid work.

PRO BONO LAW ONTARIO (PBLO)

Pro Bono Law Ontario (PBLO) was founded in 2001 with a mandate to increase access to justice by promoting and facilitating opportunities for lawyers to provide pro bono (free) legal services to low-income Ontarians and the charitable organizations that serve them. PBLO engages in three core activities that flow from this mandate:

1. Facilitating pro bono participation by developing best practices and pro bono policies, addressing regulatory barriers to participation, and educating the private bar via publications, conferences, presentations and continuing legal education curricula. As a result of PBLO activities, 20 of Ontario’s largest law firms have adopted pro bono policies that count pro bono time as billable time.

2. Brokering partnerships between community groups and legal service providers to provide free legal assistance to at-risk individuals and communities. Since launching, PBLO has brokered over 20 partnerships to support Aboriginal communities, children and youth, individuals with cancer, newcomers to Canada, victims of domestic abuse and urban renewal initiatives.

3. Managing three streams of pro bono projects in-house: children’s projects, charitable organization assistance (Volunteer Lawyers Service), and litigation assistance projects for low-income individuals with civil, non-family, matters.

PBLO’s project development activities adhere to the following guiding principles:

1. Pro bono projects should complement, not duplicate, services offered by Legal Aid Ontario.

2. Pro bono project development should be collaborative and address identified unmet legal needs.

3. Pro bono projects should be innovative and client centred.
PRINCIPLES IN ACTION

In 2007 PBLO launched Law Help Ontario in Toronto, Ontario’s first self-help centre for unrepresented litigants – and one of the only programs in North America that uses pro bono lawyers to deliver services. Law Help Ontario provides a number of resources to help unrepresented litigants navigate the justice system including plain language information about court rules and procedure, an automated document assembly program, called A2J, to help users complete court forms, legal advice and representation at some court appearances. A2J is Ontario’s first, free, web-based document assembly solution for unrepresented litigants.

The project website, www.lawhelpontario.org offers many of these resources online and allows users to chat with staff in real time about their legal issues.

Despite the fact that PBLO limits outreach to the court building at 393 University Avenue in Toronto, since its inception, Law Help Ontario has:

- Served 9,718 clients
- Generated 7,732 court forms
- www.lawhelpontario.org logged 207,624 page views, and
- Users downloaded 39,075 procedural resources.

In 2009, Law Help Ontario earned the American College of Trial Lawyers Emil Gumpert Award for improving the administration of justice. In 2010, Law Help Ontario received American Lawyer Magazine’s Law and Technology News Award for most innovative use of technology in a pro bono project.

Another PBLO project, the Family Legal Health Project, takes into account the connection between access to justice issues and broader issues of health, social welfare and economic well-being. The program is managed in partnership with the Hospital for Sick Children, and uses legal remedies to address the social determinants of childhood health – non-medical issues that can adversely impact a child’s health or a family’s capacity to care for a sick child. In its first year, the project served over 200 clients with issues that included sub-standard housing conditions, employment problems that arose when parents had to take time from work to care for a sick child and even tax issues.

FACTS ABOUT PBLO

Operations

- Assisted over 9,000 clients in 2009 via its in-house projects.
- Operates out of 4 offices in Toronto, including head office, two Superior Court-based self help centres (at 393 University Avenue and 47 Sheppard Avenue East in Toronto), and the Hospital for Sick Children, which houses the Family Legal Health Project to address the social determinants of childhood illness.

- Law Help Ontario, Ottawa will launch in spring 2010.
- 26 PBLO registered pro bono projects.
- Over 70 law firms participate in PBLO projects.

Finance

- Annual operating budget of $1.3 million (2009).
- Core funding provided by The Law Foundation of Ontario and Legal Aid Ontario.
- Sponsored by The Law Society of Upper Canada, which provides funding, in-kind support and opportunities for collaboration.
